While making a tour in Spain I stopped one evening at a little hostelry in the province of Cordova. It was quite dark before I ate my supper, and the table was dimly lighted by a couple of candles. But behind me was an open door through which streamed a bright light from a kerosene lamp hanging in the hall. During the evening I sat at the supper table reading, being alone, with no one to talk to. I spent the time thus till 10 o'clock, when I closed my book and pushed back my chair preparatory to going to my room and to

Just as I did so I saw on the white wall before me a shadow of a figure. The head and shoulders only were defined, and even from these I could not tell whether the person behind me was man or woman. I sat looking at it before turning to see who it was, for it was immovable, and I fancled that it was watching me. One thing about it arrested my attention. The shadow of the head was so shaped as to convince me that either the face or the back was turned directly toward me. That which I noticed especially was that while one ear cast a shadow the other did not. I when I saw the shadow of an arm glowly raised. In the hand was something, either club or knife.

I did not stop to consider whether I was about to make myself ridiculous; I instinctively ducked under the table. There I remained a few minutes and, bearing no sound, peeped from under the cloth. Seeing no one, I slowly crawled out, keeping an eye open for any one who might be laying for me. Gradually straightening up, I stood and looked about me. The shadow had disappeared; I was alone. Looking downward. I saw something red on my trousers. I put my hand on it. It was wet: there was a silt in the cloth. I pulled up my trousers and saw that the calf of my leg had been slit by some sharp instrument. The wound was still bleeding. I had a problem to decide, and quickty. Some one had intended to nurder me, doubtless with a view to appropriating my effects, but the attempt had been foiled by my quick duck. I was still in danger. What should I do? Go out into the darkness or remain where I was? I decided that my best chance was to pretend to be undisturbed till I could get at my revolver. which was in my room.

"Landlord!" I called. "A light. I am going to bed."

"Si, senor," and he brought me a candle.

"I fell asleep over my book and dreamed that some one was going to murder me. I ducked under the table. Wasn't it ridiculous?" "Ridiculous! Yes, certainty."

"Well, good night." My first act on reaching my room was to lock the door, the second to examine my wound. It was some two inches long and about a quarter of an inch deep. After deliberation I concluded to re main where I was till morning. Quite possibly the would be murderer was unaware that he had cut me, and the landlord might have been deceived by my story of a dream. I kept awake all night, with my revolver cocked in my hand. In the morning I mussed the bedelothing, and after making such sounds as one would make in dressing I softly opened my door and looked carefully out into the hall. Seeing no enemy, I went downstairs. Reassured at the ordinary appearance of those getting brenkfast, 1 determined to keep up my simulation, and, taking a sent at the breakfast table with my back to the wall, where I had seen the departed.

If the persons in that house had known what was in my mind-in other words, if I had not deceived them-1 would never have been permitted to depart. I went to the city of Cordova and straight to a police station, where I told my experience to an officer. He was much interested in my story and when I had finished said:

There are bandles in the mountains near where you were lodged, and we have for some time suspected that the landlord of the inn is in league with Persons have been missed traced to that place, after which noth ing has been learned concerning them. We will now set a trap for them."

I remained in Cordo a several weeks awaiting the results of the trapping. One day the fandford and half a dozen ill favored men who bad been caught red handed were marched into the town to the police station. I went there and looked them over. The chief police officer inspected them and, go ing to one villalnous looking man whose hair fell over his ears, pulled it aside and exposed a place where an aar should be, but it was not there "Hah-Jose Madrillo! So you have turned up ngaln, eb?" "The man of the shadow!"

Madrillo was an old offender who had lost an ear in a fight. Why he die not keep his hair in position when he attacked me I don't know. I suspect being among friends, he was careles and did not realize that his shadov not unlike the plainsman of some fora great many things that they would not scruple to do that we in a more very wrong, but when their sense of honor was at stake they would fight hard to do what they felt was right. Roger Dixon was a flatboatman In the early thirties. The boat he was Louisiana shore, he went up on to the out bringin' it mynelf bank, where he found a gambling den, and there he proceeded to lose all the money he had, but, being convinced that he had been cheated, used a long knife he carried hung between his shoulder blades on the manipulator of the gambling outfit, leaving a considerable wound. Dixon was arrested and put in Jail. The flatboat went on south with the current, leaving him devoid of funds and without even his Hherty.

The arrest and imprisonment of the cultrit occurred just as the court was adjourning for the season and would not be held again for several months. Dixon, having no money, was unable to get ball, which was allowed in his case since the wound he had inflicted was not mortal. He therefore had the prospect of languishing in jall during n hot summer, with the further prospeet of being sent to state prison for feloniousy assault for two or three years longer when the court came to Times,

The prisoner, being remanded to Jall In default of ball, stood before the judge a melancholy sight. He was about to be led away when a planter dressed in the costume of the timesaid to the court:

"Yo' homish, what's the amount of the ball in this case?"

"Five thousand dollars, colonel." "I'll go it fo' this man, suh."

"Yo' bettah not, sub. You'll lose yo' money." The colonel asked the prisoner if he would come back certain sho' if he ply was simply "Reckon," Colonel Topics. Armstrong was convinced, the bond was executed, and Dixon went free. The trial was fixed for the 4th of November, four months later. Dixon was a Tennesseean, whose domicile, where lived his wife and children, was on the banks of the Tennessee river, near the site of the present city of Chattanooga. There was no means of getting there by the way he had come, for boats in those days never went apstream, so Dixon cut across country on foot. As he left the place of his misfortune one of a knot of men who stood looking after him said; "There goes your $5,000, colonel." When the 1st of November came round Colonel Armstrong had not hAiril a word from the man be had befriended. The kind bearted colonel was an object of sympathy on the part of the inhalliants of the locality, for ing away from Tennessee for the purpose of being sent to state prison when he could get off by staying at home. The second and third days of the month passed, and on the morning of the fourth the court came together for the purpose of trying Dixon, but there was no Dixon present.
