Refusal of Judge C. L. Cole to order another postponement of the trial of several defendants named in an Elisor jury indictment means that the trial will be held at May's Landing on Monday, January 27, 10:30 o'clock.

Lawrence Thomas, a young colored boy, was the first to be arraigned on the charge of stealing jewelry from a junk dealer's store.

John Robinson and Thomas Brown were next to be charged with this offense. They pleaded guilty to entering a house and stealing a quantity of fittings.

John H. Manning, of Pleasantville, charged with stealing jewelry from a junk dealer, was released on a suspended sentence after he had promised to "sign the pledge."

Louis Nevgand and Louis Ferris were placed on trial charged with atrocious assault and battery on Gustavo Ginnac.

Founded at the head of tide-water on the banks of the Great Egg Harbor River, May's Landing has enjoyed from the first the reputation of being the most beautiful, most healthful place of residence in this section of New Jersey. Its magnificent oak trees have become famous, and beautiful Lake Lenape is scarcely less well-known. Inducements to manufacturers are exceptionally good. For the truck farmer and poultry raiser it is an ideal location, and the mecca of those seeking Summer homes at a reasonable cost.

Splendid boulevards for automobiles lead to May's Landing from every point, including the direct road from Philadelphia by way of Downstown and the Egg Harbor City boulevard, leading from the White Horse Pike. The Great Egg Harbor River boasts of an active Yacht Club open for membership. This picturesque waterway affords good boating, bathing and fishing, and is a popular highway with yachtsmen to Atlantic City, Ocean City and other seashore resorts.

Municipal conveniences include cold, sparkling water, 99 percent pure from an artesian well, supplied through a new public water works system, first-class fire protection with consequent low insurance rates, low rates of taxation, electric lighting, prosperous churches, good public schools, etc. If you never visited May's Landing, it is time to do so. If you are looking for a Summer place of residence, this is the ideal place for you. "The Town of Natural Opportunities" is Your Opportunity.

A Woman's Exploit

She Was Sent Out as a Spy
by President Lincoln

By F. A. MITCHEL

The life of President Lincoln is so thoroughly identified with the four years of war—the last four years of his earthly existence—that we are not accustomed to think of him in any other connection. During that brief period we see him under many lights, how he is endeavoring by wise diplomacy to prevent foreign governments from intervening between the north and the south to insure the separation of the states and on the same day gives to a woman of low degree the life of her son, who has been sentenced to be shot for desertion. At one moment he is urging the general to move their armies against the enemy, the next he is sending out an individual girl in her teens, perhaps to bring him information of the Confederates.

It is this last named fact that concerns Mr. Lincoln especially with the romance in adventures of the war.

A secret service bureau was organized with headquarters at the capital, led by Allan Pinkerton. It was his business to provide and equip spies, but it was Mr. Lincoln who laid out their work for them. He told them what information he needed and it was their part to get it for him. The risk they ran was very great, and their pay when they worked for pay was proportionately large.

Possibly the most successful of Mr. Lincoln's spies, that is, considering the importance of the information obtained, was a young woman, Kate Beale, who lived in Richmond, the capital of the Confederacy, and during her residence there had naturally become familiar with the place and taken on the accent peculiar to Virginia. Moreover she was supposed to sympathize with the southern cause. She was at the time of Mr. Lincoln's appointment the chief support of a young man in the and it did not seem to provide the necessary supplies.

It occurred to Mr. Beale that she might put her knowledge of Richmond to good use in going to and bringing information to the Federal government. This of the nature of a secret service. It was her duty to supply with it and to be left in a southern position at the end of the war, leaving her mother and father's support and attending to her own affairs in Washington. She went to Allan Pinkerton and laid him out the advantages she possessed for secret service work in Richmond and found him a willing listener.

But Pinkerton before employing her first measure of her fidelity to the Union cause. She proposed to disguise her friends in Richmond, but she might if she chose do this in Washington, for her plan was to offer her services to the Confederate government to go to Washington and bring back in a mail bag for President Lincoln. Washington was full of southerners ready to convey information to the Confederate government and it was difficult to tell who could be trusted.

Pinkerton pretended to trust Miss Beale, but before employing her sent word to her to try to draw from her a list of names she intended to work for the Confederacy in stead of the Union. She stood all the while and at last Pinkerton becoming satisfied that she was to be trusted sent her to President Lincoln. This was in the spring of '62, when the war was drawing to a close.

An architect of the White House she was assigned to a room in which she found Mr. Lincoln alone. He had a very simple but very plain of work for her.

"Mr. Pinkerton informs me," he said "that you are familiar with Richmond and I am anxious to learn what persons they have there on which to select to cause our spies, surround and cut off their lines of supplies. It will be your part to take notice of their depots, to see how well filled they are and if necessary, or you can do so without too much risk, learn what they have from officials. My object is to discover whether they are in a position to stand a siege or must surrender in case General Grant who is south of them at Petersburg, captures the place, cutting off their only communication southward."

Miss Beale understood perfectly what was required of her and its value it excited. Mr. Lincoln sent her off with a "good-bless you and bring me back safely from your perilous work."

Citizens were not to be trusted and for between the lines and Mr. Beale having President Lincoln's seal had no trouble in getting to Richmond. She pretended to be there against the Federal government and by selling the quantities of the supplies to the other in charge of the commissary department of the Confederate army, she was introduced to James P. Davis, who was anxious to serve the Confederate cause. She asked the commissary how she could aid in the matter of getting supplies into the Confederacy from the north. She was taken to President Davis for a reply and had a conference with him and the commissary before the executive session.

There were but two ways by which supplies could be introduced into the Confederacy from the outside, black and white, and landing a vessel at some point not guarded by Federal troops. The former of these methods was the common one. Miss Beale said that she knew Confederate sympathizers in Baltimore who would be glad to send a load of provisions to some point on the Atlantic coast if it could be assured that the ship would be run by a Confederate force. It is not a far road miles down Chesapeake bay to Northumberland county, Va., and there were many convenient points on the Potomac and the bay for landing. Mr. Davis and the commissary general were much pleased with Miss Beale's plan and spent some time conferring together in her presence as to the most convenient place for the ship to land a force to meet the ship bringing the goods.

All this was but a cover for the spy to learn of the military situation in Richmond. It was a matter of a few days before she was passing the commissary's office and very few commissary stores in Richmond and if General Grant should cut the only line of supply still open—that through Peterburg—the capital of the Confederacy would be obliged to surrender.

At that point for sending supplies to the front lines Baltimore sympathizers had been agreed upon. Miss Beale was given a pass to go through the lines and was ordered on her departure the next day.

But now at the last moment a danger came upon a singular coincidence. A Confederate spy was in Richmond who was passing the same game on the Federal that she was playing on the Confederate government. It happened that the person had seen Miss Beale coming out of Allan Pinkerton's office in Washington. Whether he remembered just when and where he had seen her or whether he was not quite sure of it, he knew at once by the similarity with which he looked at her that she was in danger.

All her thoughts were concentrated on being the man or his losing her before he could take any decided action. Appearing not to notice his interest in her, she walked on till reaching an empty car, she called the driver and entered it.

And now comes one of the most remarkable cases of assurance under peril that have ever been manifested by either man or woman. With light and rapidity she formed her plan. "Drive me to the executive mansion," she called to the driver. She was whirled away, but a glance at the man she was trying to avoid assured her that he was watching her, often to the left is at last broken.

though he was endeavoring to make it appear that he was not, and when he reached the mansion and awaited at the door she saw him hurrying after her. Entering the house, she was shown to the ante-room to wait her turn for an audience. She had nothing to communicate to Mr. Davis, her object being to be able to the man who followed her in the following business with the government. Finally, when she thought this had been accomplished, she determined to make her exit.

If her departure were outside waiting for her she felt that she was lost. Her heart was in her throat as she passed from the house. She dare not look about her but so far as she could see the man had vanished. At any rate she saw nothing of him if he were still following her he was keeping out of sight.

But she did not seek safety in flight. A few days from Richmond to the southward, the battlefields fought over by Lee and McClellan during the peninsular campaign. Miss Beale did not feel the danger to drive out to the fields. Having reached her destination she dismissed the cabman and started for Petersburg. Some very important stores of the southward.

The story of this journey on foot by wagon to the front lines is a very interesting one. It was a matter of a few days before she was passing the commissary's office and very few commissary stores in Richmond and if General Grant should cut the only line of supply still open—that through Peterburg—the capital of the Confederacy would be obliged to surrender.

At that point for sending supplies to the front lines Baltimore sympathizers had been agreed upon. Miss Beale was given a pass to go through the lines and was ordered on her departure the next day.

But now at the last moment a danger came upon a singular coincidence. A Confederate spy was in Richmond who was passing the same game on the Federal that she was playing on the Confederate government. It happened that the person had seen Miss Beale coming out of Allan Pinkerton's office in Washington. All her thoughts were concentrated on being the man or his losing her before he could take any decided action. Appearing not to notice his interest in her, she walked on till reaching an empty car, she called the driver and entered it.

Such a coincidence has never occurred in Mr. Lincoln's name with adventures of the war. But this is but one of the many incidents of romance that taken together have woven a chain about him which will last as long as his name and his work are remembered. But that which especially endears him to the American people is his many acts of mercy to the humblest of those who begged for it during the period when the shedding of blood seemed to move the clock of the world back twenty centuries, necessitating a new message of peace to earth and good will to men.

The Best Fortune Teller.

The quest of noblemen for wealth in America has been talked about for decades, but few, if any, can rival Baron Assensio in being witty in a practical way.

Miss de Williams, his prospective wife, was entertaining the baron one evening and apropos of lovers' notions she asked:

"Did you, baron, ever go to a fortune teller?"

"Yes, many times. But the last time was best."

"Where did you go?"

"I went to the probate court to find out about your grandfather's will."—New York Tribune.

An Enthusiast.

On the Long Island train were two fashionably dressed young matrons absorbed in the suffrage question.

"Do come march with me in the next parade," said the brunette with the blue bow on her hat.

"Oh, I'd just love to," replied the blond in black velvet, "and I will unless Phil fees too strongly about it. He is rather old-fashioned, you know."

"Yes, I know. So is George. But I do hope we can. All my life I've been simply wild to march behind a brass band."—New York Post.

What He Was Told.

Mother—Willie, put away those drum-sticks. Don't know your father has a headache? Willie—But, ma, when I was going into the parlor with my drum, he told me to beat it.—Boston Transcript.
