RAN AUTO ON THIRD RAIL.

Narrow Escape. Riding through a dense fog without lights early vesterday morning on their way from Atlantic City to Vineland, a party of autoists driven by Harry Kraemer had a narrow escape from electrocution when the machine left the road at Abseron Crossing and proceeded to travel up the railroads track. It progressed about twenty feet until the front exleshring the electrified "third rail."

So long as they were in the machine the rubber tires kept the car insulated, but as soon as they dismounted and attempted to touch the auto, the shock knocked them away from II. Kramer stalled his engine and did not dare crank it again.

Budly seared, the autoists hurried to the nearest residences and awoke almost the whole neighborhood by their fruitic cries. Section Foreman Daniel McClure, Track Inspector Frank Duberson and others responded and Harry Birch was summoned and the party raced to the crossing to get the machine off the track before the freight arrived. Before they could femove the heavy car Duberson telephoned to the Regasub-station and had the electric current turned off; The autoists afterward proceeded on their way, badly scared but not injured. The results would have been serious. They had bad luck prior to this accident, another machine having crashed into them, breaking the running board.

A Lighthouse Story

By CLARISSA MACKIE

The rain fell in long, slanting sheets and drummed against Joel Webster's oilskins with a noise that muffled the throb of his engine. The motorboat rose on the crest of big waves and then dived down into pitchy blackness, for it was night. He had lost his bearings on hour ago, when he had left Hadden harbor for the short trip down the coast after a cathout which had gone adrift, and now he was trying to find the harbor's mouth once more. He tried to discern the familiar light that would set him on the right course, but the lighthouse seemed blotted out.

in the storm. "I ought to be somewhere near the barbor's mouth by this time," he panted after he had recovered from a drenching wave. He bent forward and peored ahead as if to pierce the black ness with his keen eves

"Seems as if I ought to see the ledge light unless-unless something's hap pened to Peter Langdon!" He inclined his ear, and close at hand he heard the roar of waves breaking on ragged rocks. "Good Lord, if it isn't the ledge, and no light!"

The wheel soun around in his strong hands, and the motorboat put about until she was headed straight for the booming waves If Joel Webster had not known the ledge like a book he might have gone straight to destruction on the bristling rocks that encompassed the lighthouse. But his ear was trained to the voice of the sea, and at just the right moment he swung his little craft around into the narrow opening that gave upon comparatively citlet water

It was a matter of considerable skillto make a landing in the storm, but at last he moored the boat safely and came to the narrow iron stairway that Y\n know I've been quite hands about led to a door above the highest water helping set broken limbs, and"-

He turned abruidly away and opened the door that led to the spiral stairway. "I'm going to light the lamp," he said over his shoulder, and, without waiting for Peter Langdon's snarling remonstrance, he closed the door and ascended to the lamp room. In a few moments the four burners were sending

Peter Langdon needed him sorely. Some one must relieve the injured man of the agonizing pain of his broken limb., Joel thrust prejudice aside and returned to the lower room and approached the bedroom door.

"You won't be blamed because your light's not burning," he announced cheerfully "Now, Mr. Langdon, if ernwhed along the platform until he doctor gets out here in the morning, aloud, "As soon as the sea goes down,
