Usual Number of Ludicrous Answers Break Monotony of Examination—Several Applicants Must

Twenty-three aliens were admitted to full citizenship in Naturalization Court Thursday by Law Judge E. A. Higbee, when almost double that number sought to enter under the Stars and Stripes. Many were denied citizenship because of insufficient knowledge of National laws and customs, and will re-apply at the next term. The usual number of Indi-

MAY'S LANDING, N. J., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1909.

Little progress has been made during the past season in the extermination of mosquitoes in New Jersey, because the last Legislature did not make an appropriation for carrying on the good work. That the project of draining the marsh land and the swamps of the State is a feasible one, and will relieve the commonwealth of the pesky "birds" for which it is justly notorious, has been proven by experiments conducted in the Northern part of the State by Prof. John B. Smith, State Entomologist, who believes he can, in a very few years, practically exterminate mosquitoes from the State. Some of the communities in North Jersey have been relieved from hordes of the pests by draining lowlands, which should be done throughout the State. To drain a marsh here and there and leave large tracts adjoining undrained, containing stagnant water where billions of insects can breed every day, will not materially promote the project. Provision should be made by the next Legislature for carrying on the work in every part of the State, and every community should enter into the spirit of the project and clean ditches, drains and other places where water stagnates and affords a breeding place for the insects. The project is well advised, and if carried out in a thorough manner will practically exterminate for all time the annoying pest which has been heretofore the greatest objection to living in New Jersey.

The Fall schedule of the electric railroad is in effect, giving practically the same service here as during the Summer. We now have ten South-bound trains daily and eleven North-bound, a service very convenient for residents and people from other parts of the County having business here. The electric railroad service has proven a great success. To contrast the former steam train service of four trains daily to the present schedule of twenty-one makes the advantage obvious. While the steam roads out of Atlantic City do a large business with visitors to the seashore, the majority of business men use the electric road the year round, which has also a large proportion of the excursion traffic. The success of the new railroad, financially and to the people of South Jersey, has justified its construction and indicates that similar lines will be built in other parts of the State at no far distant date. The "third rail," which caused much alarm when it was first laid, has ceased to terrorize residents of the municipalities through which it passes. It is harmless to the public if people will respect railroad property and not trespass on the right-of-way, where they have no privilege.

When the old Shore Road is paved, from Absecon to Somers Point City, and the project for a bridge across the Great Egg Harbor Bay realized, that part of the County through which the road passes will become one of the most populous districts in South Jersey. A bright future is predicted for Somers Point City, which is indeed most favorably situated for a Summer resort and one of the most pleasant spots on the New Jersey coast. The little municipality by the sea is already showing signs of growing popularity with Summer cottagers and enterprising residents who have invested their money in real estate in and about the Point will no doubt be able, at no far distant date, to dispose of their property and realize big profits. The Fast Shore Line has done much to curvy favor for the resort with Summer visitors and when the new road and bridge are completed Somers Point City will go ahead in leaps and bounds.

There have been few "mad dog" scares during the past season, for which pleasant fact several reasons may be given—better understanding of that malignant disease called rabies, fewer homeless canines and more strictly enforced laws. For the first the medical men are to be praised; for the second, the "homes" for homeless animals provided by philanthropic persons; for the third, municipal authorities and the public in general. The cry of "mad dog" is one that usually inspired terror in the breast of the average person. Doubtless there are many so-called cases where the animals suffer from starvation or canine diseases, but the genuine case of rabies is rare. If people will keep no more dogs than they can keep well, abiding by municipal laws, and never turn dogs loose upon the community to seek their own living, the cry of "mad dog" need never annoy residents.

The automobile race Saturday last was better conducted in regard to marking the course than the one earlier in the season, when the avenues were literally covered with white paper trailers, indicating the course to the drivers of the machines. The roads were designated in the latter race by signboards erected on the telephone poles along the course, which was not objectionable to residents of the municipality and served the purpose better than the paper litter.

They say down in Georgia that an old backwoods centenary still drops in occasionally and asks whether the war is over. Up here in Jersey, in this particular community a few years hence, people from Carmentown, Reega and other outlying districts will perhaps be dropping in now and then to ascertain the status of the High School question.

After all the failures of explorers to reach the North Pole, it is singular that two men should, within so short a time, lay claim to the honor of being the first man to stand at a point where there is neither longitude or latitude, nor day and night as we have in this part of the globe. It is said that the greatness of the feat should be marred by personal controversies, when there is glory enough for both explorers who claim to have discovered the pole. The discovery of the exact location of this long-sought point will establish important scientific data.

With the nomination of Republican candidates for various municipal offices at the caucus Monday evening last, the Fall political campaign was formally opened in Hamilton Township. Practically all the old officers were renominated with a unanimity that attested to their popularity. There is no doubt that all will be re-elected November 3 next and that the Republican Ticket in this district will carry with a big majority.

The Constitution of the State will remain unaltered, and officials who would have been affected by changes provided in the five proposed amendments will pursue the even tenor of their way, since the people of the State, by a decisive majority, refused to ratify the amendments. Little interest was shown, however, by voters, except where efforts were made to warp the issue into one of political significance.

The Township is to be congratulated on such an efficient Committeeman as Charles D. Makepeace, who in his capacity as Treasurer, has exercised a keen foresight in Township affairs and made a very valuable official. Mr. Makepeace heads the Township Republican Ticket for re-election this Fall and the people will make no mistake in accepting his future services.

Assessor of Taxes Harry Jenkins and Collector Clark W. Abbott, who are up this Fall for re-election on the Republican ticket, have filled their offices exceptionally well and their faithful services have done much to promote the financial interests of Hamilton Township. Their candidacy means their re-election by a heavy majority.

Good roads have a considerable influence on the settlement of land and promote the agricultural interests of rural communities. The good road system of Atlantic County can be materially improved during the coming year, establishing proper highways from Tuckahoe, Milmay, Dorothy, Risley and other places to the County Seat.

Elvey Kendall and Ansel B. Crowell, Republican candidates for Overseers of Roads, are men whose ability in maintaining good roads is too well known to need exposition, and who will go to victory at the polls November 3 under the banner of the Grand Old Party.

"What so rare as a day in June," sighed the poet. "What so pleasant as a September day in May's Landing," say we. With the weather neither too warm nor too cold, the pesky mosquitoes laid up with rheumatism and Old Sol shining his best, no one can be censured for it if he prefers this season of the year to all others.

STATE PRESS COMMENT.

"This is the period of the year when the ravages of typhoid fever become most apparent in our centres of population, and call for the exercise by the citizen of more than ordinary care, particularly as to the character of the liquids that are taken into the system."

"There is especial call for caution in this section of the year, owing to the prolonged drought, which has practically dried up the smaller streams and reduced the larger ones to such proportions that the water can scarcely escape more or less pollution. Filter plants are of absolute importance, but even they have their limitations in exceptional seasons like the present."

"There is another source of typhoid danger beyond local control which makes itself especially apparent at this season. For two months past thousands have been visiting various resorts of the country and subjecting themselves unwittingly to dangers from the use of impure milk and water."

"To many the pleasure of a summer outing are followed by sufferings and prostration due to a prolonged illness from enteric fever. That this disease is contracted at the summer resort and developed at home is completely established in thousands of cases. Of forty-five new cases of typhoid which were reported in Philadelphia last week, seven were conclusively shown to have been contracted outside the city, principally at seashore resorts. Many of the local cases have the same history. It may be impossible to prevent the development of cases thus contracted, but it is part of prudence for every person to exercise every precaution at the present, when unusual conditions have rendered our water supply liable to more or less contamination."—Trenton State Gazette.

"While Newark and Jersey City are laboring under a frenzy of political excitement over the coming November election, down here in Camden along that line everything is as serene and quiet as a bright May day morning, and our citizens refuse to become in the least excited over such minor matters as the North Pole controversy, the Smith-Sugent duet, the inhabitants of Mrs. Johnson's failure in giving a knockout blow to his latest opponent, the fate of the proposed Constitutional amendments, or what Governor Fort proposes to do with Mayor Stoy. There is really but one important topic in the air. The burning query comes from over the river, and is 'Will the Athletics smother the base ball pennant from the Detroitis this year?' and the standing of the other Philadelphia club at the finish." After these burning issues are decided politics and other less important matters may have an inning and innocent pedestrians given a show in fighting their way along the public streets on which the record of games in progress are now posted."—Camden Post-Telegram.

"The Democratic State Committee, which met at Asbury Park last Saturday, has evolved a pronouncement which consists chiefly of an enumeration of alleged Republican shortcomings. As a declaration of principles it is a serious failure, which may perhaps be accounted for on the assumption that there are no principles worth mentioning on which the members of the committee could agree. It is simply a blind bid for votes, based upon Republican lapses and the failure of the Republican party to redeem its platform pledges. There is no definite specification of policy or indication of what the people may expect from Democratic rule—nothing but glittering generalities and misleading statements."

"The Republican party is not perfect and the Legislature is admittedly open to criticism for its failure to live up to some of the party's platform pledges, but the record of both the party and Legislature is infinitely superior to anything the Democrats have to offer, and there is no room for doubt as to which organization public-spirited citizens will tie up to."—West Jersey Press.

"People who own vicious dogs will take notice that they will have to go to their local postoffice hereafter for their mail. The Postoffice Department has issued a regulation declaring that carriers are not required to deliver mail at residences where vicious dogs are permitted to run at large. Persons keeping such dogs must call at the postoffice for their mail. That is a wise and very proper regulation, as vicious dogs have cost the lives of several faithful and efficient letter-carriers who were attacked while in the discharge of their duties. Complaint owners of vicious dogs have been contemptuously disregarded, and letter-carriers have been retarded in their work in efforts to escape the fangs of petted curs, frequently, however, receiving wounds that had to be promptly quaterized. The new regulation is for the protection of the carriers, who, generally speaking, are welcome visitors to the home, and it is also for the deserved punishment of persons who keep and pet vicious dogs."—Camden Courier.

ONE AUGUST NIGHT.

She Was Told the Story of the Lady of Shalott.

By VIRGINIA LEILA WENTZ.
(Copyright, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.)

It had been an unusually oppressive day even for August. Every one seemed sleepy or sleeping. Cobblers slept with half mended boots in their laps; Italian women slept at their fruit stands with sleeping babies at their breasts; horses trotted conscientiously along in front of sleeping drivers.

In the department store where Antonio Wheaton worked the day had been difficult, especially behind the stuffy corner where she measured out ribbons. And, oh, what a godsend the loud sounding bell at 6 had been! Most of the girls in the store were city bred, and they accepted the conditions of August philosophically, but Antonio Wheaton had come from a fresh little country town in the west, and as she leaned from her boarding house window—she had a rooming house—down a few minutes before going down to dinner it seemed to her that she was locked in a place of torment from which no escape was possible.

They dined at 7 in Mrs. Brown's boarding house. In the half hour that Antonio had been home she had taken a sponge bath, brushed her silky, faxen hair and changed her black alpaca dress for a simple white muslin. As she leaned out of the window from the open space beside the storage house in the rear she could see the dust carts roll down the streets. The whistling of their big rotary brooms reminded the country bred girl of large turkey gobblers sweeping the earth with disdainful, proud wings. The open space faced the west, and, resting her little oval cheeks in her hands, Antonio could see that the sun was doing its best to set with some sort of rightful beauty, even in this homely downtown section.

"Where the quiet colored end of evening smiles!"

Antonio was speaking to herself in a reproachable fashion that was growing on her, trying to recall some verses which Francis Logan had recited to her one sunset time down on the Battery. She had fancied she could remember them, they were so simple and lovely.

Just then Mrs. Brown's cracked dinner bell rang.

Across the long, narrow table Francis Logan glanced at Antonio with something like a lump born of a big, protective instinct rising in his throat. Every vestige of fresh country rose bloom had fled from the girl's sweet face, and in the intervals when she fancied she was not observed the young fellow's alert eye noticed that black lashes rested heavily against her cheek as would those of one who is overwary.

Antonio's weariness struck home perhaps because of contrast. Francis himself was more than usually happy that night. The big important house where he was employed had that very morning sent a note to his desk informing him that his salary had been increased some $10 a month. His dear mother, over in Devonshire, had just written him that a relative had left her an unexpected little legacy. Altogether the world was going well with Francis Logan.

"You look pleased, Mr. Logan," observed Mrs. Brown from her accustomed seat at the head of the table. "Ah, I remember—this is your favorite soup!"

For five years now young Logan had been an inmate of Mrs. Brown's establishment without having ever changed his seat at table or his room. Naturally Mrs. Brown sought to ingratiate herself with him.

"Why, my dear," she had exclaimed once to Antonio in a burst of enthusiasm, "he knows all the poets by heart. He sees only the best plays, even though it may be from gallery seats. He knows all the finest pictures up in the Metropolitan. He has what they call an 'artistic' taste too. My lands, you should hear him notice the sunset at the end of the new city street or a tiny flower out in the park or—"

"Yes, I know," said Antonio impulsively, for once coming out of her reserve. "He's pure gold—that's what he is!"

"Huh! 'Gold'?" Mrs. Brown had retorted disdainfully. "None of your pretty, soft yellow stuff for him. He's good, solid, sterling steel. If any one asked me, 'Don't you forget it, Mr. Wheaton. And if you could be fortunate enough to be up to him'—"

Mrs. Brown had broken off abruptly at a flash from Miss Wheaton's eye. She dared not presume too far with Miss Wheaton, in spite of the silky, faxen hair and the childish dimples, as many of the young men in the department store had found out.

If only they could be a little more like Mr. Logan! Antonio had more than once found herself commenting as she planned up her colored belts. "He is the soul of honor, and I—I don't know what I'd do without him!"

"Had a stroke of luck today, little girl," Logan waylaid Antonio as she was going upstairs after the scrawny saucer of raspberries, made purple with milk, had been eaten. "I want you to come out tonight and help me celebrate—if you'll do me the honor."

A little later, from the basement dining room window, Mrs. Brown, who was arranging her cloth for the next morning's breakfast, watched them go up the street together. Antonio, in her simple white muslin, wore a nodding spray of pink roses at her waist. As they walked toward the west the young fellow's eyes were fastened adoringly upon her.

"Guess they'll hit it off all right," commented Mrs. Brown as she went on refilling the porcelain saltcellars. "I'll tell you what we'll do," said Francis as they walked toward the cars. "We'll go out to Riverside drive and sit there for awhile till the night gets cooler; then we'll go to some big

ON THE ROOF.

He Didn't Want to Seize the Opportunity, but She Did.

By HARRIET LUMMIS SMITH.
(Copyright, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.)

"We're time enough yet to take a look at the city from the top of the Securities building. It's worth seeing, you know."

Prudence should have vetoed the suggestion. For the longer, half of the blissful afternoon Viola had been aware that Raymond's eyes were saying more than they should and that their mute eloquence was singularly sweet and satisfying. Considering the fact that she was as good as engaged to another man, discretion counseled flight. A voice within, an authoritative voice, cried out that at the best the day would soon be over and urged her to make the most of it.

Viola compromised. "Mr. Raymond suggests our getting a view of the city from the top of one of the skyscrapers," she said, turning to her out of town guests. "If you are not too tired"—And her heart leaped at the prospect of their protest.

She walked beside Raymond silently, glad that he, too, seemed to have yielded to her. She was frightened to find herself clinging so fervently to the joy of that afternoon together. He had come upon them quite by accident, but Viola knew that but for her he would have lifted his hat and gone his way. The gladness that leaped to her eyes at the sight of him, the tremor in her voice as she spoke his name, had been his undoing—and here. They had launched and taken a drive along the boulevards. Viola's country cousins had had the time of their lives. And now the western sky was red, and the time for saying goodby was near.

They stood looking down upon the city. Raymond, as in duty bound, pointed out the objects of interest. The country cousins hung upon his words and declared that they would have missed the sight for anything. As for Viola, she had no eyes for the crawling streets between the steep cliffs of brick and stone nor for the crawling creatures far below. Brazenly she fastened her eyes upon him.

He turned suddenly and looked into her eyes, and his own caught fire. A moment later they were standing together in an angle of the roof, sheltered from the view of their companions. The noise of the city below them seemed far away.

Raymond broke the spell by a downward gesture. "I wish it were all mine."

"You mean the whole town? What greediness!" she laughed. "So that I could give it all to you?"

"Thank you, but I'm not ambitious to be a plutocrat. Of course one must have the things one is used to. Poverty is the worst of all."

"Is it?" His eyes challenged hers. "Oh, don't! You make it so hard for me!"

"You make it hard for yourself when you fight against your heart."

"Oh, you don't understand, Phil. It isn't as if I had only myself to think of."

"Do you ever give a thought to me?" She put her hands over her ears in sudden terror. "If he listened longer she was lost. 'I must go,' she said hurriedly. 'I've stayed longer than I should, but it was so pleasant.' She turned in a panic and fled across the roof, and he followed slowly. When he overtook her her eyes were dilated.

"They're gone!" she gasped. "Why? Leonard and Bessie. What could have induced them to go without us?"

"I don't know, I'm sure. But they will be waiting for us below without doubt."

He tried the door, rattled the knob sharply and met questioning her gaze with a blank stare. "We're locked up here," he exclaimed. Then as Viola laughed hysterically he added in haste: "Don't be frightened. It will be very easy to attract some one's attention."

Half an hour later, flushed and dripping with perspiration as a result of his fruitless exertion, he acknowledged his mistake. "Your cousins must have thought we had gone down before them. But after they got home and we failed to make our appearance it was of course owing to somebody that we're still up here. And the only thing to do is to resign ourselves to wait with what patience we can muster."

She looked at him reproachfully, but he did not meet her eyes. He sat some distance from her, staring moodily at the roof. Furtively Viola put back her veil and smoothed her hair. Apparently her appearance was to him a matter of complete indifference. He never turned his eyes.

Her sense of resentment found voice at last. "Are you going to sit here in absolute silence? Haven't you anything to say?"

"I have plenty to say, but I can't say it without taking advantage of the situation."

A long silence; then Raymond felt the slipping of a small hand down his sleeve. "I rather think, Phil," said a tremulous voice, "that I want you to take advantage of the situation."

Help was long in coming. As the darkness fell Viola drew closer, and her hand stole into his of its own accord.

It was a night without a star, and for that reason it was the more startling when suddenly a blinding illumination lit up the space where they sat. Viola shrieked and hid her face on her lover's shoulder.

"Only a searchlight, dearest. Rather startling on this pitch black night, wasn't it?"

Viola blushed in his arms. "Phil, do you suppose anybody saw?"

The young man smiled. "Perhaps," he acknowledged. "In fact, little girl, I rather hope somebody did."

Fifteen or twenty minutes later the sound of approaching footsteps told them that release was at hand. Raymond shouted. There was a sound of a key turning in the lock. A grinning

What Woe'd Him.

A friend once asked an aged man what caused him to complain so often at events of pain and weariness. "Alas," replied he, "I have every day so much to do. I have two falcons to tame, two hawks to keep from running away, two hawks to manage, a serpent to confine, a lion to chain and a sick man to tend and wait upon."

"Well, well," commented his friend, "you are busy indeed! But I didn't know that you had anything to do with a menagerie. How, then, do you make that out?"

"Why," continued the old man, "listen. Two falcons are my eyes, which I must guard diligently; the two hawks are my feet, which I must keep from walking in the ways of sin; the two hawks are my hands, which I must train to work, that I may provide for myself and those dependent on me as well as for a needy friend occasionally; the serpent is my tongue, which I must keep ever bridle lest it speak unseemly; the lion is my heart, with which I have a continual fight lest evil things come out of it, and the sick man is my whole body, which is always needing my watchfulness and care. All this daily wears out my strength."

Had the Effect.

"Yes," he said in answer to some thing he had said, "the old songs are very beautiful."

"Beautiful!" he exclaimed enthusiastically. "Beautiful hardly describes them: They are—they are—well, compared with them the songs of today are trash, the very trash."

"I agree with you, yet the old songs sometimes contain sentiments that one cannot wholly approve."

"I think you are mistaken."

"I will give you an illustration. There is John Howard Payne's 'Home, Sweet Home,' for instance. You surely do not agree with all the sentiments it contains?"

"Why not?" he asked warmly. "Why not?"

"Because," he said, glancing at the clock, which was marking the hour of 11—"because there is a line in that song which says 'There's no place like home.' You do not believe that, do you?"

Then he coughed a hollow cough and arose and went silently out into the night.
