AGRICULTURE.

FEEDING COLTS .- To feed oats to colt in winter some farmers think is injurious. It is objected that grain of any kind is too stimulating for young ani mals, and that they will grow up more hardy if kept on scanty feed. 1 regard this as an error. The usual food of an animal including grain is not stimulating. Were that the case there would be no question as to the impropriety of allowing grain to your horses or other animals. Grain contains more nutriment than the same bulk of straw or hay. If fed in large quantities to one not worked sufficiently to keep the digestive powers very active, the stomach and other organs will be impaired and the health of the animal will be injured. Bat given indiciously, grain promotes either young or old. I think the proper way to harden an animal is not to eramp the growth of its organs but to develop them to the fullest extent, and nutritious food is indispensable to this engines, or to ignite electric lamps. "A end. Some of the best horsemen allow a small quantity of oats or corn to colts as soon as they will eat them-from a transmitting one thousand horse-power quart to two quarts per day during the a distance of say thirty miles, an amount first winter, and a more liberal allowance the following year, increasing the million candle power, which would quantity gradually. Oats are prefera-able, as corn from its olly nature pre-disposes to inflammatory diseases. This
