no little embarrassment in the Boston Post Office. The supply was cut off on the 18th, but Postmaster Tobey desided to make all possible efforts to keep the office open during the night, and prevent any stoppage of the mails. He procured a supply of candles, closed lahterns, and locomotive headlights, by means of which work was done during the night. In the baseme of where the second and third class mail matter is handled, the men worked by the light of the lantenes and headlight, and made as good progress as could be expected under the circumstances. During the day and night all the though matter was hand led with some delay No mails were missed, but many of them were of necessity forwarded in an incomplete condition. The newspaper mail going out of the city fared the hardest, a large portion of it remaining untouched in the bags as it came from the publishers: This is a notable example of Democratic reform Congress has been able to vote plenty of money for bogus avestigations, but allows the business in

The young woman who fell to his lot was a bouncing Virginia lass, plump and pretty, who would weigh at least 140 pounds. He was in no haste to get into the saddle. He watched very carefully how the rest of the fellows got their fair companions upon the upper deck. He was the last man to swing his horse into line. He had a little him a month later Jones asked how he doubt, too, about the horse.
