T was 4:30. The September sun beat down on the crowds which thronged the county fair grounds. The final heat of the last horse race had just been trotted, and the perspiring spectators, who had been packed four deep about the track, turned their steps toward the center of the grounds where the silken mesh of a big balloon was filling out symmetrically over a blekory fire which crackled in a hastily

The event of the day was scheduled for 5 o'clock, and the patrons of the any part of it. From a flat shapeless mass that lay inert on the ground there gradually arose a glistening dome of shimmering silk, enmeshed in a spider-like web of ropes. The dome grew and rounded steadily. It became a huge ball; its silken bag was stretched smooth and taut with much rustling and many smothered exclamations from the onlookers. It trembled and strainwas adjusted beneath it.

Meanwhile, in a stuffy little room back of the manager's office, near the entrance gate, a heavy-built young man stalked nervously up and down, mopped his red face, and now and again pulled out an ancient silver watch and anxiously marked the approach of 5. His white tie, his patent leather shoes, his long, black cutaway with the white chrysanthemum in the bottonhole and his tan gloves of an obvious newness, all proclaimed the
