MAY'S LANDING, ATLANTIC CO., N. J., SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1878.

TAKING TOLL.

VOL. I.

A country road o'er hill and plain; A rustic bridge, in distance seen, Spanning a stream whose silent flow Divides broad fields and meadows green.

A still and cool September night, Lit by a full-orbed harvest moon, Whose silver radiance, soft and white, O'er stream and bridge and hill is thrown

Our carriage, drawn by alcopy steeds. Blow down the hill and o'er the green, Its course pursues, till near the bridge We pause to view the peaceful scene.

To the sweet maiden by my side, A lover fond and true I've proved, But, till this hour, the prudent fair Has given no sign that I am loved.

Ah, softly sighing, blushing warm. She rests, a dear load, on my breast ; My arms enfold her slender form. In close embrace, long, sweet and bleet.

We near the bridge-our hearts beat high With love's first, fondest, deepest bliss; Just as we cross the sounding planks Our lips units in one fond kie;

Our horses quickly turn the ridge, Beyond our wheels more swiftly roll, And as she glances toward the bridge, My maiden whispers, "taking toll?"

"Darling." I cry, "a joy like this Repays whole months of toil and pain, And hope and fear." She, am ling, says: "Then, love, let's cross the bridge sgain!"
