The sales-room, as Parker discovered ext morning, was a long, narrow partment, with allow ceiling and dingy indows.

In it moving day appeared to reign erpetually, and the effect was depressing in the extreme, as may easily be magined.

The household gods of different peole met on common ground, and seemed frown upon each other. A wretched danb, called "Moses in he Bulrushes," was the most striking blect of the whole collection.

Every day. for several years, had his work of art been offered to the ublic without finding a bidder. It was the one failure of Mr. Simon Swearingen's public life, and he had owed to sell it still before he died, therwise he could not consider himelf a successful man. So much he confided to his nephew, lay, by intrusting to his powers of eloquence the sale of "Moses in the Bulrshes.

Meanwhile the nephew was desired o make himself useful by handing up mall articles, and to attend particularly o his-Mr. Simon's-peculiar style. Even on that day-the old gentleman emembered it afterwards only too well -even on that day, that little black bonnet with the let ornaments in it, perched upon crimped masses of black hair, which set off a round brunette face to the greatest advantage, bobbed up and down in the auction-room even on that day a little black glove gingerly handled dirty vases, and felt at dusty curtains; and such a little gaiter revealed itself, as its owner tiptoed about evincing the greatest curiosity as to the goods on hand. "A very pretty woman," said old
