Electric Lights In Town.

The citizens ordered the electric lights last October, but by the numerous "hold-ups," eplitting of bairs, absence from duty by Councilmen, amending, re-enacting, etc., the poor fellows who lost all this time have been worn out.

Then there are the "opinione." They worked well, and the town pays. Mr. Stephany's "opinion" is asked upon "tweedle," then he must needs explain "dee." Next, the wise men of Council wish to know the difference between weedle-de-dee and tweedle-de-dum. He is asked to explain the meaning of "Constanti," and the next meeting shows that "nople" was omitted. Finally he tells us that Constantinople means Constantinople, and his wiedom is mentioned on every tongue. In the meantime, the town pays for the socalled "opinione," and the people plod in darkness.

That electric light business has been 'held up'' under every miserable little pretext that could be invented, and any boy in our High School could have rendered all the "opinions" necessary, for, after all, they are but opinions, and bave no weight except as one sees proper to observe.

If the people of this town wish to be kicked around in the electric light game so as to let "some other fellow have the job," then they can take their choice. It gives some friend of an "expert" a $100 job. P. H. JACOBS.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of last week you speak of the little that I have been able to do at Elm among Italians, in advancing their Christian evangelization.

For the sake of truth, I feel it my duty to eay that my success in great part is due to the loving and disinterested co-operation of Mrs. J. A. Cunningbam and Mrs. C. H. Luttgens, who obtained the use of the school house and organized the choir; also to the co-operation of a committee of the Italian Evangelical Church. To them, also, we are indebted in great part it we secure the attendance of a good halfdozen Italians from Elm at our Evangelistic Church.

I beg you to publish this, in the interest of truth.

PROF. A. MONTELEONE. Hammonton, Feb. 18, 1897.

MR. EDITOR: In your last leaus I eaw a statement of the committee that there would be no dancing at the B. of V. and W. R. C. maequorade party, which was held last Monday evening. Whether it was the decision of one of the female members of the committee or not, I don't know, but at a late hour this one announced that the party was over, and that if any wished to dance they might. And they did. Now when the Sone will decide, by vote, that there shall be no dancing, and have it down in black and white, I will do what, I can to support them. Monday ovening's proceedings made them no friends.

Monday says:

An impressive service was held in the English Baptist Church yesterday morning, when eleven persons were introduc-ed to the Sacrament of Baptism. It is described as the most touching service of the kind ever beld there. After a short prayer service, they together with three others were given the hand of fellowship. It was a beautiful sight to see, as one whole family was taken in, and husbands whose wives were long members, and children for whom prayers were often made, stood happy in the Lord, and then together united in partaking of the Lord's supper. SHOOTING A MAN-EATER. Thrilling Incident Witnessed by as of Travancore, in Southern India, writes an account of a thrilling incident witnessed by her on a recent Sunday morning. A party of Europeans were about starting for church when news was brought by a native that there was a tiger in the bazaar, writes the woman. O. said, "I don't think that's possible; we are so far from the jungle, but it is something, no doubt, and must go and see what it really is.

faking his gun and the servant, we both drove off to the bazaar. Arrived there, we found the natives out o their houses in the greatest state of excitement, and all congregated near the corner of a street and talking and gesticulating at once. We pulled up and O. was taken at once into one of the houses from the back upper windows of which they said be could see the tiger. I remained in the pony trap and was very pleased to see coming Captain -, with his gun: O. came out just as he arrived and said there certainly was an animal of some kind but he couldn't or wouldn't say what He said they must go round to the back, and round the corner they both

It seemed at age, but it really wasn't, when I beard bang, bangl and there came a crowd of natives round the corner, running for their lives up the main street, one crying out, 'One man dead.' This was too much for me, so I got down and approached the corner, when another bang, bangi I hesitated a little and then, to my great relief. I saw O. coming to me, looking rather grave. The tiger is dead was all I cared to hear for the moment and almost directly a buge tiger, not looking at elfdead, was bild at my feet. I then heard the story. When they got round to the back of the houses there, sure enough, was the tiger, who, seeing them, made over the little mud comnound walls into a plantain tope. They followed as near as they dared, the natives being all round. Before anything could be settled as to what was to be done out eprang the tiger on a untive close to O., and before a shet sould be fired the native was under him. Then came the first two shots I had heard. The tiger left the nativedead, as it happened-and made for another, but before much intschief had been done the second two shots were fired and the ther rolled over into some water, from which he was pulled out quite dead. The first poor native was carried to the hospital, but was found to be dead, being badly manied. If, an was thought possible, the bullet had struck him it was a mercy. Every Day English. ___ ANCIENT AND MODERN ATHENS

Ancient Athens spread round the Acropolis, especially on the hills facing the south, which are now uninhabited: The new town lies to the north of the antique citadel-an extension of the luster of houses already existing at the foot of the rock when the war was ended. Two main intersecting streets were laid out-Acolus street, starting from below the Aeropolis and running northward, and Hermes street, leading from the royal palace toward the Piraeus. The capital was thus designed to lle in the valley between the Acronolis on one side and Mount Lycabettus on the other. No ambition of future development is traceable in the original plan. The ground chosen and the width of the main streets tend to show that the founders of the new city little Lycabettus and spread beyond the valley on both sides, principally in a southwesterly direction. It is the novelty of distinguishing good-conduct presences from the others by their dress. Under the new plan the coariets are graded according to their conduct and, accordingly, their desire, confirmed by their conduct, to do right. It makes pro-greatly from the ordinary dress of working mechanics in the outside world.

Every prisoner desirous of mending his life considers it a distinction to wear this superior dress of merit, as it may be called. Reformation is thus encouraged within the prison walls. The second grade uniform is a loud check, and is supposed to net as a check on the prisoner's conduct.
