School for Chautauqua Crews.

The "school" is a tent, it happens. The students are admitted for training only upon passing certain entrance examinations. The preliminary tests are not in Latin or Greek or the sciences. Men are admitted who can lift a good load, and work without fussing or flunking. Each man must qualify as well, in thoro' reliability. Moreover he must be able to meet people as a gentleman. The young men who go out to distribute advertising, to take the Chautauqua equipment into a town, to set up the tents and put things in running order are the connecting-link between the permanent staff of the association, most of whose members never come to a Chautauqua town, and the talent or entertainers. They have responsibilities as Chautauqua representatives as well as Chautauqua workers.

Because the men must measure up to so strict a standard, college students have been selected to fill the crew positions. The winners on the track and the gridiron figure as leaders. The crews are made up of fellows with spunk enough to be paying their own way through college. They are men who stand high in general scholarship, and in outside activities.

One of the branches of instruction in tent school at Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, is in the operation of moving-picture machines. From forty picked crewmen, seven are chosen who have stood highest in the try-out of an officer of the Board Examiners of Massachusetts. These seven are taught to understand the details of machine construction, the fine points of film-patching, the lighting plant in general. The motion-picture operators have charge of the lighting of the tents and grounds, where this year, electricity is used. Fortunately, many of the crew men are engineering students. At the Crew school, the wiring is built complete before the first May Chautauquas open. Blue prints are made indicating the exact placing of the system. The "plant," then all ready for connecting with the local feed wire, is carried about in the Chautauqua baggage cars as part of the equipment.

Another branch taught in the crew school is practical platform building. The stages of the Chautauqua auditorium tents are of special design. They are made not only for strength but for facility of transportation. They must be easy to put up, easy to take down. Besides, there must be no serious wear and tear in the process, since each platform is pressed into service fifteen or sixteen times in the course of one season. A design that eliminates the use of bolts and nails altogether has been adopted. The trusses or horses are so placed as to brace each other. The sills are simply dropped into their places. The floor, made in sections, is laid on. All the preliminary building has been done when the crews start out for the summer campaign. The test is pure manipulating.

The care of the canvas affords place for another sort of schooling. In each crew one member is especially trained to guard the condition of the tents. When a house is built it is built. When a tent is hoisted the labor of keeping it up has just begun. One must sit up with it at night to keep it in temper. One must study its moods when the sun shines, quiet its nerves when it blows, keep it from shivering when it is cold, allow it to yawn when it is hot, pet it like a capricious child. The comfort of the audience as well as the life of the canvas demands this care.

The feature of the Junior Chautauqua adds more branches to be taught at the training school at Swarthmore. The young men who will lead with story telling, games, songs, nature lessons, in the different towns, are meeting every day now. Under the supervision of the physical director of the college, all forms of active play are taken up. Schools and play grounds of nearby cities are visited for hints of most successful ways of working with children. The young men who will conduct the hikes and the athletic sports among the older boys are working out new stunts daily, too.

Away from the Crew School, and away from Swarthmore, some of the most indispensable training taken by the Chautauqua men is in autocar driving. The men who take charge of the advertising are in the first place experienced in the running of an automobile. Their instruction at the autocar factory has to do with acquiring special mechanical skill that will make them absolute masters of the most trying emergencies that might be met in a rain or shine hurry-up tour over the face of five states in the space of seventeen weeks.
