Miss Dunning has oversight of Miss Laura Loring's place, on Fairview Ave., while the owner is away.

Approaching the house, Saturday last, she saw that some one was inside. Summoning her brother Albert, he gave chase to the intruder, who ran eastward toward Bellevue. Ben Foglietto was passing, and took part, soon overtaking and capturing the fugitive, who was delivered to the authorities with above result. Evidently, Moore had leisurely ransacked the house, leaving things in confusion. Nearing Bellevue, he threw away several old coins, which were identified on Sunday by Miss Loring.

That his name is Moore is doubted, as he evades questions, and destroyed all letters by which he could be identified. His photo was taken, and sent to City Hall, Phila., for investigation.

We are in a position to offer big assortments. Lower prices prevail in every department, due to the small proportion of expense compared to the amount of business done. In other words, the expense of conducting the business, compared with the amount of goods sold, places us in a position to undersell others; and you, as buyers, cannot afford to overlook this saving.

"WHEREBY HE STUMBLETH"

W. E. are going to be very happy," said Eliza, nodding across the dinner table to her husband. "Of course we are, darling," he answered. They had returned from their honeymoon a few days before.

They were both young, endowed with a splendid capacity for enjoyment, and Eliza held a lucrative position in the city.

Eliza had dismissed the housemaid from the room. They preferred a tete-a-tete meal without interruption. Eliza was sitting on a wickered bench, and her husband was sitting on a wickered bench.

Eliza acknowledged the toast with a pretty little bow, and then she turned to her husband. "You are a very good man," she said, "and I am very glad to be married to you."

Every day at dinner the Grangehams took their wine, and with lunch Eliza always drank a glass of port.

She did not care for it particularly, only the doctors had ordered for her. "You are a very good man," she said, "and I am very glad to be married to you."

Afterwards in the drawing-room, Eliza said: "How stupid you are, Phil, to be afraid of a glass of wine! You had better give it up altogether and turn teetotaler."

"I have thought of doing so sometimes, but I don't want to go too far of a sudden," he said. "I will try to be a teetotaler, but I will not give up wine altogether."

"Whereby he stumbleth," Eliza said, creeping closer to Phil. "Ah, my dear, you are going to make a mistake. You are going to make a mistake."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

lower in his own respect, and that of other people.

"I hate you," she told him once, facing him wrathfully. "Did I marry you for this—to be degraded in the eyes of the world?"

So one day Eliza went back to an old aunt, with whom she had lived before her marriage.

More than a year later a letter came from Eliza directed to an unknown hand. When she opened it she found it was from a minister working in the East End.

She forgot all her anger and resentment against him then, remembering only how dear they once were to each other, and she went.

"Was this really on a wickered bench, and he lay stretching on a wickered bench in a more wretched corner in one of the poorest slums in London."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

THEY BOTH HEARD.

In the bad old picturesque days of the price revolution, when angry countrymen threw candlesticks across carriages and the quagmire of your young men too often ended in coffee and placards for two, a certain fair and laughing lady, Eliza Grangeham, was prominent for a short time in the fashionable life of London.

Neither married, and left, she was a few waiting years, retired with broken fortunes to spend the rest of her life on the shores of a lake in Lancashire. Both lived respectably, kindly and quietly, but neither was in the least degree shaken by the superficial habits of a razor world.

The sober villagers regarded them with respect, yet a trifle of awe, and the good pastor was troubled for their spiritual welfare.

Their peace abided in the Kirk, which they faithfully attended. They listened decorously to texts and allusions that often seemed to bear a personal application. Whenever the minister "leveled" against "card players and gamblers," the lady, with her eyes fixed on the minister, began to deal firmly with "careless livers and profane swearers."

"You are going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

THE ABSENT-MINDED AMPERE.

Ampere, the famous mathematician and physicist, was one of the most absent-minded men that ever lived, and the following story from the "Pitt-Rivers" goes far to prove it.

In September, 1866, Ampere read a paper on his researches into the "Electricity of the Atmosphere," in the Academy of Sciences.

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

A BIRD OF GOOD OMEN.

"That an owl I hear, Lyddy Ann! Lucky it is today, and not yesterday, if it had started in before Sunday. I have finished up my visit, you have had a pretty row-de-do. Of all the superstitious folk ever I come across, you are the most superstitious. You don't know what you've escaped."

"That owl looked away here," Lyddy Ann said. "There is something in that owl, I am sure. I don't like to see it, but I don't like to see it."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

WINDS OF THE DESERT.

What were the winds of the desert? Her billows, oftentimes, blew the winds that she felt as a person ally.

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

"I am going to do well for you, my dear," he said. "I am going to do well for you, my dear."

The Trolley Situation.

Many good people in Hammonton are much interested in the trolley, and have asked me to tell them about it. This I will do, as briefly as possible, in this article.

In January last I received a letter from a western Construction Co., having offices at Youngstown, Ohio, and Omaha, Neb., saying that it had just come to them that Hammonton was agitating the building of a trolley line from Philadelphia to the sea, and that their company would be glad to investigate, and if the proposition seemed feasible, to finance and build the line.

As soon as I could get my breath after reading this letter, I sent a reply, giving the exact situation as I saw it, and expressing a hope that we might be able to do business with them. Within a short time a second letter came, asking for further information, which I promptly gave them. A little later, a third letter came, asking for still further information, assuring me that they were interested in the proposition, and offering to send the company engineer to look the ground over carefully, if we would pay his actual expenses while so doing. The engineer was to tell us exactly what the company will do in regard to financing and building the road.

Two other letters came later, in which the company seemed more and more interested in the proposition, and promising to begin construction work early in the spring if upon examination they could see a reasonable return on the investment after the road had been in operation for five years. All they asked was a fifty year franchise and reasonable co-operation on the part of the people who would be benefited by the road.

The company seems to be a very much alive institution. It has recently constructed the Omaha, Council Bluffs, and Sioux City Traction line, ninety-four miles long; also the Iowa Traction line, 110 miles long, and is now building the Erie and Youngstown double-track line, sixty-six miles long. It ought, and doubtless will, be able to build a line from Philadelphia to the sea in record breaking time if all the people who want the line, and would be benefited by it, will get busy.

About this time, the long spell of bad weather struck Jersey, this coupled with the fact that our Board of Trade was not yet in shape to do business, made it impossible to do more than to submit the correspondence to my friend, James Brearey, ex-mayor of Chesilhurst, and through him to many other people. These men were all greatly encouraged and enthused over it, as I had been. From inside information which has kept coming to me since that time, I am convinced that the desire for a trolley line as described is more general than many of the croakers have been willing to admit.

It is true that New Jersey, as a whole, has more railroad and trolley lines, in proportion to its area, than any other state in the Union. It is also true that central South Jersey has two of the finest railroads on earth. For long distance travel they could not be excelled, but for short trips along their lines we must have the trolley before we can do very much in locating factories and securing other improvements. This is self-evident to thinking men.

We are told on good authority that the W. J. & S. R. R. carries more freight out of the state than the whole state of Florida sends out. Also, that the per capita of manufactured articles in this state is greater than that of any other state in the Union, or any nation on the face of the globe. But the fact remains that this section is badly handicapped by lack of a trolley line from Philadelphia to the sea, and cannot keep step in the march of progress and improvement with other parts of the state because the others have trolley lines, which gives them factories. We cannot get what honestly belongs to us, because we are behind the times in this very important particular. Vermont and other states north of us, where it costs more to build one mile of railroad than to build ten in South Jersey, have trolley cars in abundance. Why may we not have them? We may have, and right soon, if we go after them as the boy went after the woodchuck. "Get him? I've got to get him; we're out of meat at our house, and the preacher is coming."

Let us all go after this trolley woodchuck, and we'll get him.

I. A. VANPETER.

Hammonton is a live town, of live people, where health and happiness await your coming.

DEAR SIRS:—In the "Republican" of May 20th, I note an article referring to the tricking of automobilists; also to 22 arrests being made for violation of speed law, etc. As correspondent for seven Philadelphia, three Atlantic City and two New York dailies, the burden of blame for any incorrect statement emanating from Hammonton would probably be placed on my shoulders, hence, in fair play I respectfully request that you publish this letter and allow me to make my position clear.

The article referring to a trick practiced on drivers of machines, was published in the daily papers on Friday, May 22, was dated from Hammonton, and referred to "a measured mile on the County Boulevard south of Hammonton." The article regarding 22 arrests was published four days later and distinctly said these 22 arrests were made at Elwood, although wired from Hammonton. These articles were both true and correct, and were not used in conjunction with each other, as your editorial implies.

As correspondent for certain dailies I cover the territory between Haddon Heights and Egg Harbor City, exclusive of these places, and am compelled by the telegraph company to date all dispatches from Hammonton.

In writing other stories that method is frequently practiced by district correspondents. Time and time again I have let good stories go, because I was not sure of correctness of details; hence I trust you will favor me with publication of my denial of carelessness, incorrectness, or any desire to injure the town whose best interests I have for years endeavored to advance.

June 2, 1914.
Sincerely, THOS. B. DELKER.

O. C. Daminger's wagon containing two boys, was run into, last Friday evening, by a "racer" auto, smashing the wagon into bits, but not injuring occupants or horse. The driver of the machine, finding no one injured, proceeded on.

Mrs. Will, Birdsall, of Pleasantville, died suddenly after an operation, on Monday. Mr. B., a brother of our townsman, is quite well known here, having been employed as a carpenter. Funeral services were held on Thursday.

On Sunday, the driver of an automobile attempted to turn at Elvin's corner, but having little experience, smashed into a pole, bruising him, also a little girl, and shaking up the ladies. The auto was badly damaged.

Friehofer's huge advertising auto wagon, resembling those used in circuses, containing a whole band electrically run, paraded the streets Tuesday night and Wednesday morning, and entertained hundreds, young and old.
