FOURTH OF JULY.

The day was all that we expected, and more. Despite predictions to the contrary, the weather was fine. The extreme heat of several previous days was moderated, breezes from the west cooled the sun's rays, and everybody appreciated the change.

The snap and bang of fireworks was almost incessant all day, after six o'clock; but we must expect that. With it all, happily, there were but few burned fingers, and no serious accident.

People began gathering at the Park in the forenoon—many taking a picnic dinner there, and remaining until night. The crowds came during the afternoon, and kept increasing until the evening there were more people than we ever saw at the Park. They came from everywhere, came for pleasure, and found it.

There was a lively scramble of little folks, as Mayor Austin raised the flag, releasing scores of tiny flags.

Rev. F. L. Jewett made the address, and a good one, not the traditional spread-eagle speech, but a quiet appeal to reason. Properly, he lauded his country, and some of its prominent men; but called to mind the necessity for good and righteous living, that the land we love, the government which we approve, may continue to be what it has become.

—the one which all nations consider when momentous matters are to be decided or movements of world-wide importance are under consideration.

Our Band did their part well, giving us good music during afternoon and evening.

The races drew a large crowd, and the number of entries (and enthusiasm) exceeded that of several years. In the potato race, there were forty contestants, and there were seven heats. Other races were equally interesting. Much credit is due A. L. Jackson and his assistants. The winners are as follows:

1st—Chas. Hannum.

2nd—Russell Fisher.

3rd—Benjamin Connolly.

The fireworks were certainly good. They lasted but thirty-five minutes (and should have been an hour), and proceeded without a hitch. Some of the set pieces were particularly pleasing, one the battleship. One bomb released, high up in air, what looked like a very brilliant arc light, which floated slowly away, illuminating the whole country for miles around. If we could secure half-a-dozen such, anchored in proper positions, we wouldn't need so many electric wires and lamp posts on the streets.

The Park looked like fairy land in the evening, with its multitude of people moving about to the light from hundreds of electric lamps. The lights and shadows through the grove, the colors worn by the people, the flashing here and there of children in holiday garb, made a picture that will be remembered many a day.

Altogether, it was a Fourth almost ideal; and to the committee men, who worked hard to arrange and carry out the programme, we tender thanks from an appreciative people.

The Electric Light Company shut off all current at midnight, last Saturday, and worked from that time until Sunday night to connect their engines with the new boiler. Owing to a misfit in the pipes, their men were delayed three hours, and the churches had no lights for evening service. The Baptists closed up, but the Presbyterians sang familiar hymns and their pastor preached in the dark. At nine o'clock, however, everything was bright again.

table. Even the finger-bowls were laden with tins they gleaned like diamonds.

"This isn't the day for clean linen," she remarked, looking at the table.

"No, ma'am, but in fresh apron and tidy I can look unqually cheerful."

"No, ma'am, but the new cook is expected to have the effect of her good cooking spoiled by being served on spotted linen."

"I'm afraid to run up laundry bills," muttered the mistress.

"I'll foot the laundry bills," exclaimed Ellwood. "A meat like this is worth something extra. She's a peach. I don't doze the look off her."

"I can look at it," sniffed Mrs. Ellwood. "She wears goggles and has her hair combed straight back. Saves the steam burns her eyes and takes the crinkle out of her hair."

"I'll have to go to her with compliments," said Ellwood. "She grins so satisfactorily in his delight over—their food."

"Remember 'the agreement not-to-mutt in,' reminded the son.

"True! Better not risk it, I guess."

"Later in the week, when the expected guests had arrived and the host had taken them to the dining-room for a appetizer, he was surprised to find Sarah in charge, beaming in a cap and apron, as if she was a fubion. She administered dexterously to his every want—a thing that proclaimed training for the occasion.

He was delighted with the appearance of his niece, the accurate, pleasant, and efficient, the appearance in the shape of delectables, casseroles and—carafes, having been brought to the light of day and placed within an inch of their lives."

"This is tip-top, Auntie," he said.

"I'm glad to hear it. She's more than you cracked her up to be. I'll raise her wages."

"At her own request, the paragon arranged the menu for dinner—advised that the meat was not only good but good for the family. That she got fairly bonny from the head of the table, knowing that with every dish she set before him he was adding a substantial argument in favor of home rule to the country."

"What—what—Ellwood?" exclaimed one of the guests, "if you can compromise me as good a cook as you have—and such, perfect service—I'll give you some property and build here."

"Find everything right to your taste," said Ellwood, "rubbing the salt in her hands gloriously but not daring to look at his wife or son. "I think one of the best things we can do is to let her build a school for the perfection of culinary art!"—said Ellwood.

"That's a graduate of a cooking school."

"I've a mind to offer her double wages to come out to us," facetiously exclaimed the president of the land company.

"George if I do, I'll triple it."

"Suppose I raise it and quadruple it?" cried a third, the fecundity of the occasion getting the better of his discretion.

"I wouldn't marry her!" he protested the host in a burst of merriment. "You say, I'd marry her! She's a valuable asset to any family."

"What about the punishment for drunkenness, that?" asked young Ellwood.

"The mother laughed. "A man would be justified in committing bigamy to acquire such a rarity. She's a genuine—that's what she is! Now, sir, here's your chance. If he isn't, playfully she would be sure to make up to a girl like that—that we could overlook her having earned her own living and enjoy her cooking." He laughed merrily over his own joke.

"The good food led the table many a tortuous and profoundly re-entertaining a blushing young person by the hand. She was clad in neat plain gingham that detracted nothing from the curves of her fresh young body.

"I'll give you a reward to thank you for your advice," began young Ellwood.

"I'll continue to do so. I intend to marry the paragon of the kitchen."

"Oh, what? What? What?"

"I'm not weighing about it. I'm sure."

"The self. What's all this?"

"This is Miss Gayler, my fiancée, who came to help you out of a difficulty and to introduce you to her good qualities. She has, according to you, been a great help to you. I'll give you. You remember your promise to do anything in reason? I—I now claim my reward in making your sanction our engagement."

"Hush my boy, I'd no klen you had such a probant taste such kindness. You are your father's niece. Take her my lad take her. It's worth in far above ruttles."

By the time a woman like this won of all beauty entertained because of her husband, her sons are grown, and she begins to grow fatuous on their care.

SOME STORIES OF THE USEFUL

about forty miles and a terrific east-north of storm from Washington in New Hampshire, like the Nile from "Albion." Nyaneia, a river of sufficient depth and breadth to float the steamers that ply in summer on the lake—that is seldom heard from," said a former New Hampshire man.

"The Androscoegin in all the trouble and tumult continues to flow on unvexed to the sea, carrying blessings without number to the land and people, the cattle on a thousand hills birds of the air—and the fish."

"The region of this river is not exempt from conditions prevailing elsewhere. The Connecticut River, on the other side of the State and at the lakes but twenty miles away, is doing its share in the same way. It carries out farms and towns inundated and its gorges, fetching death and destruction to their course."

"Why, every one will ask, is the Androscoegin peaceful when all others are destructive? The Nile from Albion are bent on devastation? The answer is easy. A plain man, now deceased, Coe by name, and with a great head for business, who owned saw mills on the river, had the wisdom to spend his money in the construction of great holding the flood from the water—back when it would do only harm and having it for use during the long summer, when it would do good only. He dammed the Androscoegin at its principal source. The dams form three great lakes in the wilderness covering the divide between the waters flowing through New England and those flowing into the St. Lawrence, which holds back the flood until the storm is past. Thus one wise man at his own expense for the people of two States," concluded the New Hampshire man, according to the Washington Star "what great so-called commonwealths have not had the wisdom or enterprise to do."

WAS A BELLE IN OLD EGYPT.

According to European archaeologists, the exact manner in which Egyptian ladies attired themselves centuries ago is now known. The ladies are buried in the pyramids. This question was raised recently owing to the discovery of the mummy of the famous Thais, who was so beautiful that she charmed even Alexander the Great, and afterwards, she shared his fate of being crucified from this manner it was very hard to obtain an excellent idea as to the costume worn in Egypt by the noted belle, and in this way all adequate information in regard to the fashion that prevailed in Egypt during the epoch was soon secured.

Dr. Gager, a distinguished archaeologist, took special interest in the matter, and, having procured all the necessary parts of the costume, he arranged them in a life-size figure. The dress consisted of a long, flowing robe, with a wide collar, and many were the expressions of surprise at the announcement that the necklace, bracelets, hair comb, gold rings, white sandals, and all the other parts of the attire were actually buried with the mummy.

The mummy was found in the land of the Pharaohs at about 2,000 years ago. Even the soft swollen garments had lost little of their old brilliant color.

Would Imitate Vesuvius.

A genius at Port Hill in planning to give an imitation of Vesuvius in eruption at Mount Signal, a volcano in the town of Port Hill, has planned a mountain to about 1,000 feet in height and is covered to the summit with grass. The idea of the promoter is to form an artificial crater on top and explode patent explosives that pitch out lava, which will be a mountain of the grassy sides of the mountain would produce a conflagration. In a short time the entire mountain would become solid mass of flames, which could be observed for a distance of about 100 miles.

Century Mark

A colonel in the army at the head of his staff in 1912 was in the city of Chicago. He was a man of the Chicago Daily News. "The graveyard's name is given as Knafkoff, and he is said to be 109 years old. As he was found to be in full possession of all his faculties, he was taken to the city officials to see what was the department, it is reported, to describe verbally the circumstances of Napoleon's invention."

Charles Pratt of Hyde, England, has just celebrated his 100th birthday. He is still full of bodily vigor, and at times may be seen busy with the spade in his garden. His mental faculties remain unimpaired.

and it will be many years before stop-paying interest on the Spanish War bonds. Whether a particular war is justifiable or not, the people engaged in it have to pay for it. "What is the matter," says the money-lender, "with the money being wisely spent, and what opposed it include the 'wicked waste of money' among the reason for their opposition. But neither vocates nor opposes the war. As we direct on this phase of the subject advantages of arbitration become increasingly apparent.

"The public has had its attention called lately to two questions which are of the greatest importance to the working life, but which bring in strong contrast the variety of character that end may have. In the one place, the trades unions have been asked to 'What shall we do with the unemployed 500,000? Employers no longer allow him, they say, to compete with younger men and take him from the bench and put him on the shelf—his case, retirement, while it meets the needs of the man, is done with him. Here we have, therefore, a somewhat serious economic difficulty. It is not only the workmen who are meditating upon old age. It is the millionaire. Not long ago the man of the world, the man of the world had an animated newspaper discussion on the propriety of early withdrawal from the pit. Some men thought it was one and some another. The same variety of opinion now appears in New York. Mr. Hewitt, who asks the way of the world, says that the man that this is a matter in which every man must be his own judgment. Mr. Hewitt hits the nail precisely on the head. To begin with, some men are fitted for leisure and some men are fitted for work. The man of the world, building large country houses, spending away millions in the course of the year, planting whole forests at the expense, hiring whole forests at the expense, stocking them with game, directing the course of streams and filling them with strange fish, maintaining troops of men and having a family of his own like Kubla Khan, the Caliph of Baghdad, and all this is a deadly bore to Mr. Carnegie, again, enjoys reading and writing and encouraging scholarship. He is fortunate. He does not have to build a house, or to be a manufacturer could lead the same kind of life with the same kind of satisfaction if a man has hobbies and avocations as well and good. Let him give himself up to them. His neighbor, however, who is not so fortunate, has no other means of employment and pass the idle time any time in rest and quietness." It is better for him to continue to catch the train and to keep his stenographer busy. There is no general rule for the man of the world. He must find a man to retire. Interest and duty may lead another man not to retire. One man's meat is another man's poison. All that can be said is what Mr. Hewitt said. Let each man be his own master. Let him choose his own life when he wants to.

"Professor Triggs is being quoted that 'the little things are dying out.' That state of mind comes of having an open fire in the house at night.

Special school meeting at three o'clock this afternoon, to consider the purchase of the Tilton-DePuy property. This is owned by Mrs. F. S. Tilton and her sister, Mrs. DePuy, except one lot which is owned by Mrs. C. D. Jacobs, bequeathed to them by their father, Moses DePuy. The lot is 100 x 300 feet, the price is low, and either the Town or the School District should buy it—before it is removed, and keep the land for public use.

Wonder how many of our good people who were the means of our boys giving up Sunday baseball games, now attend the sports on our home grounds every Saturday? Very few, we fear. Hardly one-fourth the number have so far patronized them, that went to Egg Harbor one Sunday last year. What would Hammonton be without a club? Think of it this afternoon, and see our boys win a line game from Collingwood.

Many of our people went down to Atlantic City this week,—the largest number on the Fourth,—to see the air ships. As Hammonton people are not slow in adopting new things, we may expect the new mode of travel to become quite common ere this time next year.

They Voted For License.

They voted for license, these that we know: They voted to bring some near neighbor to vote.

They voted for poverty, misery, crime. They voted to crush fellow men for all time. They voted, unthinking perhaps, or to please the one who wanted money to live at his ease. The money man "loot" said: "I should vote."

The laborer's home, and should bless his street. They voted a worse blow to labor than trust or capital gives it—a blow and a thrust.

And this the result of that voting. They'll see That strong man, and true, will to drink send the knee; Their houses go to ruin; their children, now dear.

Will get for their portion just blows with a street. They voted for license, yet maybe they'll think. As they see some poor soul on the down road through drink.

That they are responsible. Maybe some child, in rage, gnaw with hunger, with eyes big and wild. Will shake their conscience; and so, before long.

They'll get of themselves—"Did I help do this wrong?" For when these men voted strong drink to drink. They voted themselves all the pangs of remorse.

MRS. ORVILLE BASSETT. Hammonton, June 27th, 1910.

It looks as though there was a disposition to believe that petition for extending Third Street to the Lake. That the new street is a necessity, any one could see on the Fourth. Nearing the Park, Egg Harbor Road was filled with automobiles and teams, going to and fro, and especially in the evening it was difficult for pedestrians to dodge them all.

No, we do not believe that Mr. Giacomo will be granted a license next Tuesday evening. Why? Because the application has been turned down repeatedly because of his location—not because of the man,—and it would look as though bringing influence had been brought to bear to change Council's mind. They are well aware that Mr. Imhoff and the other neighbors, as well as citizens generally, oppose a saloon on that corner.

TUTORING. Pupils in the Primary and Grammar Grades will be assisted by a competent and thorough teacher, at moderate rates. Address, "Teacher," this office.

Two young ones (not very young either) hired a horse and carriage at Barnhouse's livery, on Monday. What became of one of the ones we know not; but the other got so drunk that he fell out of the buggy into the swamp, near Folsom. The horse kept on, and was only found on Thursday, near Malaga, in the barn of a farmer who found him wandering on the road. A pretty story, isn't it? One more score for rum. And the men will have a nice bill to pay.

A RE Your children conditioned in their grammar? Don't wait until September, but give them a tutor now. A limited number received, on Monday, 1910.

Address, "Teacher," this office.

Several cases of beer among a company of Italians, out on Thirtieth Street, caused a fight between two of the men, last Sunday evening, both using revolvers,—one receiving a wound in the abdomen, and the other in the wrist and leg. Under the circumstances, both were taken to Cooper Hospital. Neither seemed seriously hurt, and one was bro's back on Monday, put in the "cooler," and taken to May's Landing, Wednesday, to await recovery of the other. As long as men will sell and drink rum, we must expect such results. There is nothing commendable in the stuff, and everything to condemn.
