

EXPLOSION AT N. Y.

Boiler Explosion on a Staten Island Ferry-Boat on Sunday.

APPALLING LOSS OF LIFE! OVER 50 PERSONS KILLED

Double that Number Wounded

We take the following account of the New York disaster from the Herald, of Monday morning:

The city was startled with a new horror yesterday. A sensation like an electric shock passed through our people as the first news of the disaster on board the Staten Island ferry-boat Westfield found its way to the public. There has been no calamity so replete with horror, with so long a list of casualties and of such direct and awful interest to the dwellers in our own city, as the present since the bloody riots of 1863. The Staten Island ferry-boats are practically excursion boats, and are more crowded on Sundays, and especially at about the hour when this explosion occurred, than at any other time. There are said to have been at least four hundred people on board, most of them pleasure seekers going to pass the warm hours of the genial Sabbath afternoon in the shady groves of Staten Island. With this crowd of cheerful hearts on board the boat was just ready to steam out of her slip at Whitehall, when suddenly the terrible crash of an exploding boiler broke upon the air, and the boat was rent from stem to stern, from upperworks to keel, and the throng of merry hearts were suddenly a struggling, mutilated, bruised and dying mass of humanity. Some were thrown in the water, some on the piers, and some were pinned by the splinters of iron and wood to the wreck, while others—how many remains yet to be seen—were hurled at once under the debris and beneath the troubled waters in the slip. Without one moment of thought or an instant of preparation forty-five persons were rent to their account, and probably a hundred more were bruised and mutilated. The last steamboat explosion at all approaching the present one in its direct reference to our own citizens was that of the Albany steamer St. John, just as she was rounding into her dock in the upper part of the city, in October, 1865, but it did not begin to approach the present one in the number of its victims. There were only twelve persons killed on that occasion, and about fifteen wounded. The Westfield explosion has heaped up a holocaust in comparison.

The cause of the present explosion seems to have been a patch on the boiler; one of those economical devices that save the expense of replacing entirely a boiler that has already served its time. The boiler that exploded had been in use nine years, according to the testimony of the engineer, and we should think that it had endured considerable wear and tear.

The engineer, who appears to be an honest, straightforward man, states that he had tried the cocks only a few moments before and found plenty of water in the boiler, it being full up to the top cock, and the gauge showed that there were only twenty-seven pounds of steam on.

It was a good boiler, he said—on the patch, which he had examined on Thursday last, seemed to be in good condition. The boiler had been overhauled last winter, and had even passed the examination of the United States Inspector as late as last month. With the exception of the patch where the explosion occurred the boiler seems to have been all right, and the engineer seems to have been careful.

The theory of the explosion must be sought for in an imperfect patch, unless further particulars of the terrible disaster give more satisfactory clues to the cause. The Coroner's investigation may set the question at rest, and if it should be shown either that a pennurious disposition on the part of the company owning the boat or carelessness on the part of the engineers has served to produce the catastrophe, the Grand Jury have their sternest and strictest duty to perform in the matter, and the people will see to it that they perform it to the full extent without fear or favor. It is stated by the engineer that, although he has his regular certificate, he has never shown it to the company's officers, they did not require a certificate on that ferry. Now is a point that must be investigated.

STATEMENT OF THE ENGINEER.

It is exceedingly doubtful whether the cause of the explosion will ever be ascertained. The officers of the Company claim that the boiler was made of the best material, and having been so lately inspected, they cannot account for the explosion. The engineer, Harry Robinson, a mulatto, has been in the employ of the Company for several years. He is said to have been a very careful, steady man, in whom every confidence was placed by his superiors. He went on board of another boat immediately after the explosion, probably fearing that the survivors would lynch him if he remained on the Westfield and became known to the crowd. In conversation with one of the officers of the boat on which he took refuge, he stated that he could not account for the explosion. It was not owing to a lack of water in the boiler, because, on leaving Staten Island, there were four cocks of water, and a sufficient time had not elapsed to work down to more than three at the utmost. The fireman on duty, Patrick Finnegan, was badly scalded, and cannot, therefore, give any information with reference to the cause of the explosion.

THE CAPTAIN'S STATEMENT.

Capt. Isaac Vreeland, the commander of the Westfield, was in the pilot-house at the time of the explosion. He was about to give the command to cast off the lines that made the steamer fast to the landing, when he heard a dull, heavy sound, and felt a jar that shook the boat violently. His first impression was that one of the South Ferry boats had run into the bow of the Westfield. He was soon undeceived, however, by the rush of escaping steam. He at once turned his attention to the task of assisting the passengers down from the upper to the main deck, and afterward in taking ashore those who were scalded and otherwise injured. From his position at the rear of the boat he was unable to see the explosion or what at once followed at the forward end of the boat. He was unable to say what caused the explosion. He had always thought Robinson, the engineer, to be a careful, experienced man, and one that would not be apt to carry more steam than allowed by the terms of the certificate of inspection. He believed there were not more than 200 persons on board, and of those he did not believe more than 25 percent were killed or injured. He admitted, however, that the greater part of the passengers were in that part of the boat that felt the greatest force of the explosion, in order that they might enjoy the southerly breeze and at the same time be in the shade. It was the first time that any serious accident had occurred on one of the Company's boats.

THE SECRETARY'S STATEMENT.

John J. Stevens, Secretary of the Staten Island Railroad and Ferry Company, stated that he was in Brooklyn, visiting a sick relative, at the time of the explosion. It was the first Sunday that he had been absent from the office in six years. He heard of the accident on one of the Hamilton avenue ferry boats. One of the deck-hands told him he saw the explosion. He could hardly believe it possible, as no serious accident had ever before happened to one of their boats. He visited the injured at the station house and at the ferry house, and on the Northfield, and saw that they were properly attended to. He produced certificates to show that all of their boats had been inspected within the time prescribed by law. The boiler of the Westfield was inspected on June 15 last. He could not account for the explosion. He had not seen Robinson, the engineer, since the disaster, but had always considered him a very capable, efficient man. The Westfield was an extra boat and made trips between the regular boats. She was intended to leave Whitehall at 1:30, and 7:30 o'clock P. M.; but none of the boats ran exactly on time. It was intended to have, as nearly as possible, one boat in the slip all the time. So fast as one departed another arrived to take her place. This was done because the people would rather remain on board a boat than be cooped up in the waiting-rooms. There were not generally so many people carried by the extra boats as by the regular boats, those running hourly trips. He had been told by the captain and others that there were not more than 200 on board the Westfield. There was often double that number on the regular boats.

LATER.

At the time of going to press, 88 persons (which includes those who have died from their injuries) are known to have been killed, and the list of wounded and missing is still incomplete. The number of wounded persons is given at 160. Wednesday, New York, teemed with mourning trains.

THE REFORMERS IN MULLEN TOWNSHIP.

EDW. N. J., July 31st, 1871.

Sir: You have repeatedly and publicly in your columns asserted your claim to fair dealing by saying that you would not take sides in any controversy so long as you make an equal hearing to all parties. You have made good on this promise. You have not only made an equal hearing to all parties, but you have also made an equal hearing to all parties. You have not only made an equal hearing to all parties, but you have also made an equal hearing to all parties.

There has been dissatisfaction in this township touching the administration of the affairs of the township. It is not a new thing. It is an old thing. It is a thing that has been going on for a long time. It is a thing that has been going on for a long time. It is a thing that has been going on for a long time.

The above is a copy of a letter received from the chairman of the township. It is a letter that is full of interest. It is a letter that is full of interest. It is a letter that is full of interest. It is a letter that is full of interest. It is a letter that is full of interest.

We are willing, as we have repeatedly stated, to give parties the privilege of discussing questions of public interest in our columns. But we do not expect to have them open up a long and tedious discussion of every question that comes before them. We do not expect to have them open up a long and tedious discussion of every question that comes before them.

Without choosing to repeat this circular and detailing out wherein in our opinion, it varies from the truth and leaving the people to draw their own conclusions, we will say that we are not in favor of the circular. We are not in favor of the circular. We are not in favor of the circular.

Must be Sold!! Must be Sold!!!

DRY GOODS!

We are compelled to vacate our store in a few months, and in consideration of this, we have finally concluded to determine to get out of the Dry Goods business as soon as possible.

Remember, this is a Fact, The Entire Balance of our Stock Must Be Sold, as the premises HAVE TO BE VACATED.
