VACATION—SCHOOL.

When study and school are over,
How jolly it is to be free,
Away in the fields of clover,
The honey-sweet haunts of the bee.

Away in the woods to ramble,
Where merrily all day long
The birds in the bush and bramble
Are filling the summer with song.

Away from the stir and bustle,
The noise of the town left behind;
Vacation for sport and muscle,
The winter for study and mind.

So play till the face grows ruddy
And muscles grow bigger, and then Go back to the books and study,
You'll find it as pleasant again.

Adjourned.
Don't use a gallon of words to express a teaspoonful of thought.

"I do not send my men where I will not go myself."

It was Winfield Schley who said this when he was commander of the New-York and stood on the forward bridge of his ship outward bound from one of the ports of the Atlantic seaboard. Ten minutes before a badly frightened man had run up to him, calling out:

"Captain, the forward port magazine is on fire."

"Then shut your mouth," said the captain. The man, thus recalled to his senses, touched his hat and relapsed into silence, while the captain quietly ordered a fire-drill and a moment later commanded the flooding of the magazine. Both orders, a part of the daily routine on every American warship, were promptly carried out, but it was not until all danger was past that the officers and men obtained any knowledge of the true state of affairs.
When they did find out, they realized that their captain had been standing all the time just over the magazine, and one of the officers begged him to come down from the bridge and let him take his place. It was then that the captain made the remark quoted above.

Few of us gain by the mistakes of others, but he who fails to profit by his own mistakes will soon be bankrupt in knowledge.

BALLADE OF HYPERBOLE.

When the East is bright with its golden glow,
And your heart is full of the days of old,
The thought of the day of the long ago,
And you thrill with awe as the tale is told;
Then knights in search of the dragon strode,
And the monster slayed with a single blow;
Then maidens were blessed with defenders bold—
But remember this never was really so.
There's the Princess fair, whom so well you know,
(The one in the tales by romancers told,
With the crown of rose and the neck of snow,
And the apple eyes and the hair of gold,
Who was Beauty's self set in Virtue's mold,
Ever true to her Prince while every breath
For her smile would give you all the wealth
Of the world—remember the never was really so!

When you hear Love's word spoken so sweet,
And the blood in your veins to your cheek is rolled,
While your heart beats glad with no thought of "I,"
And you're filled with joy almost unrolled;
When you hear the beauty and grace of a word,
With a warmth that Love can alone bestow,
When of days to come a fair tale is told,
Just remember it never is wholly so.

LEUVOL.

Princess, your fancies of life enfold
A place, no doubt, for a dream chateau,
But beware that you are not "over-crowded,"
And remember how little is really so.

LIEUTENANT CLOVER.

THE Colonel seemed much disturbed. He looked at the window and gazed out at the empty parade. He walked to his desk, and Adj. Caldwell Clover, who was signing orders, glanced out of the corner of his eye and saw that the colonel was pulling his mustache.

Then the colonel sat down and said rather sharply, "Are you busy, Clover?"

It was not customary for the colonel to address the officers by their names in this way. He was supposed to address Adj. Clover as lieutenant, and to say that the young man was surprised because he didn't object. In fact, it pleased him to have the colonel speak to him familiarly, only it was so unexpected.

"I am not busy, colonel," said the adjutant.

"How old do you think I am, Clover?" asked the colonel.

"Why, I don't know, colonel," stammered the adjutant, "not any older than you ought to be."

The colonel was sifting a sheet of paper with the paper. "I want you to go something for me, Clover. I have come to depend on you so completely for everything that I am going to put this personal matter in your hands. I want you to write a proposal of marriage to a young lady for me."

The colonel was much embarrassed. His face was red under the tan.

"A proposal of marriage?" echoed the adjutant.

"Yes. If any one had told me I was afraid of a woman, I would have laughed at him. I tried to speak to her about it last night at the hop, and when she looked at me with those steady brown eyes of hers I couldn't say a word."

"Then it's Miss Lacey?" said the adjutant.

"It is Miss Lacey."

"Very well, colonel," Adj. Clover replied. He received the order just as he would have received an order to appoint a substitute captain for the recruits or any trivial thing of that sort, and he turned to his desk as the colonel went out.

There are those who think an adjutant has nothing due to do, save listen to thirty-seven bugle calls a day and look his best from reveille to taps. It is a mistake. He has a thousand and one things to do. He oversees guard mount, He selects the colonel's orderly. He writes letters and signs papers, and now Adj. Caldwell Clover of Troop X is asked to write a proposal for his colonel to Agnes Lacey.

When Captain Lester went east and returned with a golden-haired young wife, Lieutenant Clover danced with the bride at the reception given here.

"I am sure I shall not be lonely here," he said to him. "I find it all so very interesting, and then in the summer my sister is coming to me." They were promissory then, and she looked up at the old adjutant with a smile and said, "You will like my sister. She is not at all like me. She is almost as tall as you are and independent and brave." And from that night Lieutenant Clover looked forward to the coming of Captain Lester's fair sister-in-law.

Allen Lacey reached the post in July. Mrs. Lester had been waiting for the bride, and when it appeared on the brow of the hill, Mrs. Lester had a pair of field-glasses, and when at last the rumble of the wheels was heard they walked across the parade, and it was Lieutenant Clover's hand that opened the door and they entered and reached up to help the girl alight.

When he took off his cap to her and then escorted her and sister to the captain's quarters, Agnes Lacey felt that all her sister had written about the courteous young officers of the post must be true.

The summer was a quiet one at the post. There were a few dances; some rides over the prairie, a picnic or two, and long, quiet hours on the verandas, and then one day there came news of Captain Lester's transfer to another post. It was on the day before the one set for his departure that the colonel gave his adjutant his peculiar order.

When the colonel had gone, Lieutenant Clover leaned back in his chair and clasped his hands behind his head. He was to propose to Agnes Lacey for the colonel. He thought over all the hours he spent with her, and his face grew tender and his lips quivered a little as he remembered that to-morrow she was going away, then he said to himself: "What's the use of my feeling like a dog in the manger? She won't marry me. She'll never think of me again after she leaves here." He took up his pen, then hesitated as he dipped it in the ink. "My, but it will be lonesome when she goes." Then he went on writing, and when the letter was finished he forgot and signed his own name instead of the colonel's, and then laughed as he saw his mistake. He had to write the letter all over again. This time he signed the colonel's name, and called the orderly and sent him to Miss Lacey with the letter. And when it was done he walked up and down the room, and all that evening he felt like a caged lion. What would her answer be? Had the colonel received it? Once or twice he took up his cap to walk down past the captain's quarters, then he hesitated. Of course she would accept. Yes, but, after all, would she?

The stage left in the early morning. Lieutenant Clover noted the stir of departure about the captain's quarters. Then he saw the captain and Mrs. Lester appear, and he ran out to speak to them. He half expected to find the colonel with them, but he was not there. A flush dashed up to his face. Had she really refused the offer? If so, why? There was no time for explanations. She came out ready for her journey. She gave him her hand, and her eyes looked into his.

"I shall never forget how much you did to make my stay pleasant," she said. "I hope I shall meet you again, Lieutenant Clover."

The driver's whip cracked over the heads of the forward males, she waved her hand to him, and Lieutenant Clover was standing alone with an aching heart with nothing in the world to do but listen to thirty-seven bugle calls a day and follow the dreary routine of an adjutant's life.

Then there came a time when the country called for troops. "Boots and Saddles" quickly followed, and Troop X started for the South.

Army headquarters at Tampa was thronged with officers. Orders were speeding everywhere. Spurs jingled across the floors, and the few army wives who followed their husbands walked up and down the rows of tables in the evening and talked of what the morning might bring. Lieutenant Caldwell Clover was still adjutant of the colonel. A telegram was handed to the latter. The colonel frowned, and then said, "Lieutenant, I have a telegram from a friend now at Chickamauga. His sister arrives at this hotel to-night to join the Red Cross forces at Key West. Please meet her and see that she gets her train for Fort Tampa in the morning."

The lieutenant saluted. When the Pullman car backed into the spacious hotel ground that night, a few officers, a newspaper man or two and a young woman alighted. As she stepped forward the waiting adjutant was startled at first, then hurried toward her.

"Miss Lacey? You here?"

"Ah, Lieutenant Clover! How glad I am to see you again! It is good to see a face one knows. I felt rather lonely for there wasn't another woman on the car all day."

"I was to look out for a nurse," said the lieutenant, glancing around, "but it seems she didn't come."

The girl stepped into the broader light. "Oh, then you didn't know," she said and smiled at him. "An influenza banished the world over was seen of the Red Cross."

"It is possible?" It seemed to him that nothing but interjections came into his mouth. "You are really going to the front?"

"Going to the front," she repeated, with a smile in her face. "I shall probably meet you there." She said it so lightly that it would be a pleasure. They were crossing the wide veranda. Under Purlishoff's orchestra was playing "The Breeze." "You will come for me by and by and bring me to hear the band," she said. "It will seem like old times when we danced to the music of the regimental band."

"Were you lonely after I left the post?" she asked. No one but a woman could have asked such a question.

"I never before knew what loneliness was," he said. "I wonder if you would forgive me if I told you just how lonely I was but now." For a moment he thought only of his love for her. Then he remembered that she had refused the flower of the army that she had a mission in life.

"Tell me," she said softly.

A man may spend the best of his life in the dreary routine of an adjutant's life. When he has been cut out by all the best people, Philadelphia. But

A Young Girl's Impressions of the Disappointed Don Carlos.

It was a warm summer's evening. I, a girl of 10 or 12, sat talking with a very fashionable lady at one of the private bathing establishments on the beach. She had a kind and rather disconcerting hand played a dreamy Waltz—oh, well, do I remember it—and some interlarded dances, oblivious to the Sahara heat that roared in that spot even still late at night. Her steps to the music. Suddenly I saw a tall, commanding figure approaching, followed by a number of distinguished-looking men, who recognized a little while behind him. He sauntered up to where we were sitting and bowed gracefully to my fathered companion. She stood up at once, and while they exchanged a few words I examined that handsome and kingly face, and knew instinctively that I had before me a personage indeed. His beard, short and of ebony black, his eyes, while his eyes, as black as night, flashed brightly from his dark brown hair. His forehead bore the Olympian serenity of the gods, and, indeed, one might guess without being a word before so kingly a man, were it not for the fact that he suddenly turned his eyes almost to tenderness, and played over his regular features like a sunbeam on the statue of a god. Remembered a little while behind him. He was a prince of the blood royal.

I was brusquely aroused from my ecstatic contemplation by my companion, who, in delicate tones, said: "Maiden, be so good as allow me to introduce you to the King of Spain."

That he made but a poor sort of a husband to his first wife, Princess Margherita, was a well-known fact. He led a dissipated life at Venice, and the echoes of his follies rang through Europe; and when I saw the saintly dusky leading a life of charity and austerity, and humble in the midst of so much grandeur, I felt my blood boil with indignation against him; but his presence once forgot all save that he was a gracious sovereign, who willing told out an amusing anecdote in which he came out in colors far from glowing.

Never Too Late to Learn.

Do not worry if you do not get an early start in the pursuit of knowledge. Many of the world's most successful and useful men, as well as some of the most noted scholars, got their schooling late in life. Benjamin Franklin was over 50 years old when he began the study of science and philosophy, but he became one of the world's great philosophers. Sir Richard Arkwright, inventor of the spinning machine, was 50 years old when he began to learn English grammar and to improve his writing and spelling.

Home Duties of Indian Children.

There are home duties as well as pleasures for the children. Boys are required to look after the points, to help in the planting, to help in the harvest, and they are often made to do active duty as scare crows in the newly-planted field, where, like little boys, they fall full asleep. The girls go to gather wood, bring water, and look after the younger ones. As they grow older they are taught to cut, sew and make garments. In former days the old Omaha say, no girl was considered marriageable until she had learned to tan skins, make tents and clothing, prepare meat for drying, and could cultivate corn and beans; while a young man who had not learned to dig, to make his own weapons and to be a skillful hunter was not considered fitted to take upon himself the responsibilities of the provider of a family.

A Chapter on Crows.

From the earliest times the crow has been an emblem of high honor and authority. Originally, it was simply a bird of leaves, and was used by the ancients in the observance of religious rites and festivities.

The ancient "royal diadem" was a head-band or fillet, worn by kings as a mark of royalty. It was made of silk, or thread, or of wood, and was wound around the temples and the forehead, and then behind, the ends falling on the neck.

In ancient Rome the crown was usually made of laurel leaves, and was given to a man as a reward for conspicuous deeds. Among the Greeks, it was a symbol of honor and a token of victory. It was bestowed upon victors in the Greek

He sauntered up to where we were sitting and bowed gracefully to my fathered companion. She stood up at once, and while they exchanged a few words I examined that handsome and kingly face, and knew instinctively that I had before me a personage indeed. His beard, short and of ebony black, his eyes, while his eyes, as black as night, flashed brightly from his dark brown hair. His forehead bore the Olympian serenity of the gods, and, indeed, one might guess without being a word before so kingly a man, were it not for the fact that he suddenly turned his eyes almost to tenderness, and played over his regular features like a sunbeam on the statue of a god. Remembered a little while behind him. He was a prince of the blood royal.

That he made but a poor sort of a husband to his first wife, Princess Margherita, was a well-known fact. He led a dissipated life at Venice, and the echoes of his follies rang through Europe; and when I saw the saintly dusky leading a life of charity and austerity, and humble in the midst of so much grandeur, I felt my blood boil with indignation against him; but his presence once forgot all save that he was a gracious sovereign, who willing told out an amusing anecdote in which he came out in colors far from glowing.

Do not worry if you do not get an early start in the pursuit of knowledge. Many of the world's most successful and useful men, as well as some of the most noted scholars, got their schooling late in life. Benjamin Franklin was over 50 years old when he began the study of science and philosophy, but he became one of the world's great philosophers. Sir Richard Arkwright, inventor of the spinning machine, was 50 years old when he began to learn English grammar and to improve his writing and spelling.

Home Duties of Indian Children.

There are home duties as well as pleasures for the children. Boys are required to look after the points, to help in the planting, to help in the harvest, and they are often made to do active duty as scare crows in the newly-planted field, where, like little boys, they fall full asleep. The girls go to gather wood, bring water, and look after the younger ones. As they grow older they are taught to cut, sew and make garments. In former days the old Omaha say, no girl was considered marriageable until she had learned to tan skins, make tents and clothing, prepare meat for drying, and could cultivate corn and beans; while a young man who had not learned to dig, to make his own weapons and to be a skillful hunter was not considered fitted to take upon himself the responsibilities of the provider of a family.

From the earliest times the crow has been an emblem of high honor and authority. Originally, it was simply a bird of leaves, and was used by the ancients in the observance of religious rites and festivities.

The ancient "royal diadem" was a head-band or fillet, worn by kings as a mark of royalty. It was made of silk, or thread, or of wood, and was wound around the temples and the forehead, and then behind, the ends falling on the neck.

In ancient Rome the crown was usually made of laurel leaves, and was given to a man as a reward for conspicuous deeds. Among the Greeks, it was a symbol of honor and a token of victory. It was bestowed upon victors in the Greek

Discovered by a Woman.

Another great discovery has been made, and that too, by a lady in this country. "Disease fastened its clutches upon her and for seven years she withstood its severest tests, but her vital organs were undermined and death seemed imminent. For three months she coughed incessantly, and could not sleep. She finally discovered a way to recovery, by purchasing of us a bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, and was so much relieved on taking first dose that she slept all night; and with two bottles has been absolutely cured. Her name is Mrs. Luther Latz." Thus writes W. C. Hammon & Co. of Shelby, N. C. Trial bottles free at Crowell's Drug Store. Regular size 50 c. and $1. Every bottle guaranteed.

Tourists will travel by special train of Pullman smoking, dining, sleeping, and observation cars in each direction. Eight days will be spent in the Park. A stop will also be made returning at Chicago. The round-trip rate, $25 from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, $230 from Pittsburgh, covers all necessary expenses.

For detailed itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents, Tourist Agent, 1100 Broadway, New York, or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant Gen. Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.
